NOTES.

Indian Christians and Constitutional Reform:—By some sort of convention it has come to be assumed that the minority problem in India means the problem of satisfying the Muslim League, not even all Muslims. But there are other minorities in the country besides those represented by the Muslim League. The Indian Christians, numbering 6 millions, may not have a tradition of having ruled the country nor are they endowed with the somewhat elusive attributes described as "martial qualities." But their high proportion of education and their closer contact with the best and most humane side of Western culture, make them a highly valuable element in the life of the country. Their views on constitutional questions are, therefore, of great interest and importance. Dr. H. C. Mookerji, President of the All-India Conference of Indian Christians, has issued a statement on the occasion of his being elected President for a second term, on the political situation. He naturally begins with a reference to the War. Soon after the outbreak of the War, he sent a message to His Excellency the Viceroy in his capacity as President of the Conference, tendering the full support of the Indian Christian community for the successful prosecution of the War. Dr. Mookerji in his statement makes appreciative reference to the recent decision of His Majesty's Government removing the bar against Indians in Great Britain enlisting in the defence services and being given commissions in the Army. But he regrets that in their own country Indians do not enjoy the same freedom. Recruitment for the Indian Army is confined to certain areas and specified communities officially classified as "martial."

Lord Zetland Answered:—Lord Zetland in his recent statement in the House of Lords referred to the large proportion of Muslims in the Indian Army. Dr. Mookerji gives an effective reply. He points out that this is entirely due to recruiting being largely confined to Punjab Muslims and not to any want of physical and other requirements on the part of others. He cites the case of the Sikhs who in 1914 formed 19·2 per cent while the Punjab Muslims formed only 11·1 per cent of the Indian Army. In 1930, the Sikh proportion had fallen to 13·58 per cent and the Muslim proportion had increased to 22·6 per cent. "Nationalists hold," remarked Dr. Mookerji, "that this is not due to any loss of efficiency on the part of the Sikhs nor to any difficulty so far as the supply of an adequate number of recruits is concerned." The argument based on certain races being "martial" was a flimsy one at all times and is hopelessly out of date at present when War is no longer a matter of muscle and sinew. Unless and until, however, the constitution of the Indian Army is radically changed so as to offer an honourable career to educated men as it does in other countries, the more advanced communities will not be attracted to it. "The British administration," Dr. Mookerji observed, "does not seem to have realised how much India resents the existing policy excluding Indians from positions of responsibility in our own army."

Dr. Mookerji on the Muslim League:—Dr. Mookerji's views on the special consideration shown to the Muslims as distinguished from other minorities, including the Indian Christians, demand attention. He charged Government and the National Congress under Gandhiji's lead, with turning the Muslim Leaguers into "spoilt children." He is careful to exclude Muslims who do not belong to the League; and they are a considerable proportion of the community. He mentions that the majority of the Mussulmans of the North West Frontier Province, large numbers in Sind, the Ahrar and Krishak Proja parties, the Jamiat-ul-Ulema, a majority of Shias, and the Momins who, according to the Vice-President of the Indian Momin Conference, constitute about one half of the total Mussulman population of India. These do not subscribe to the creed, policy and programme of the Muslim League and refuse to recognise it as their representative. Dr. Mookerji said that he had before him the official statements of these organisations when he was drawing up his statement. He added: "If we attach any credence to the statements it follows that between 50 to 60 per cent of the Mussulmans of India refuse to acknowledge the claims of the Muslim League as the sole representative of the community." Dr. Mookerji concluded:

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

> I contend that the difficulties due to the communal situation are exaggerated. Nor can they be removed so long as both the Indian National Congress and the British administration approach the Muslim League and beg and beseech its co-operation. In my view, the solution will come only when the majority community and the British Government and other groups which hold similar or identical views regarding the desirability of having a federated India, come together and proceed with the task of hammering out a constitution which will not deny their legitimate rights to any social or religious groups including our Mussulman brethren.

Dr. Paranjpye at the Liberal Federation:— Dr. R. P. Paranjpye's presidential address at the All India Liberal Federation at Allahabad, eschewed the defensive tactics which for some years past Liberal Presidents have preferred to adopt and launched a heavy offensive against the Congress. He began by attacking the Congress goal of Independence. "It should be apparent" he said "that there is no place in these days for states that are not fully prepared to defend themselves in all eventualities." The present struggle in Europe is just for that reason. The Christmas messages of the Pope and President Roosevelt place in the forefront the security of small (and weak) states as the great need for world peace. Scores of writers have propounded schemes whereby this can be secured by a sort of Federation which alone will have the right and the armed force necessary to punish aggression. To assume that this is impossible is to set oneself against the most promising current of thought in our time. Then, again, Dr. Paranjpye said that comparative safety lies only in an intimate association with a large and powerful organisation. How did this organisation become large and powerful? Why should it not be possible for others to do the same? Dr. Paranjpye also ignores the psychological factor. Security, comparative or absolute, is not the motive which makes men aspire to great things. Those who play for safety must be content to eternal subservience. Dr. Paranjpye himself in his early career might have sought and would have found "safety" in the Indian Civil Service or at the Bar. Why did he choose to become a Professor of the Fergusson College on a pittance? The trouble with Liberals is that they do not remember their own younger days. That is why, incidentally, few men under forty-five or fifty years of age, and no women, are attracted to their flag. The President reiterated his faith in the Liberal methods. Lord Zetland said the other day that India will be fit for self-government only if the leaders can say of themselves that they are Indians first and Hindus and Muslims afterwards. As Dr. Paranjpye knows, this was precisely what the old leaders like Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, Dadabhai Naoroji and Gokhale used to say in every speech and on every platform. Who cared for them? They were ridiculed as being a microscopic minority. Mr. Tilak took up the challenge and carried politics to the masses. At once he clashed with authority. Gandhiji carried the same policy further and he did not wait for authority to clash with him. He clashed with it on his own initiative. The "microscopic minority" had swelled to huge proportions. The British Government woke up and realised that something had to be done.

Dominion Status for India:—The Reformer has often pointed out that Dominion Status is inapplicable to India. Apart from the legal significance which has come to be attached to the term, etymologically and popularly it has associations which are wholly alien to India and her people. Kipling's lines exactly bring this out:

> Daughter am I in my mother's house
> Mistress in my own.

It is this associational significance which has moved Eire to repudiate the status. The Afrikanders led by Dr. Malan dislike it for the same reason. Recently it was reported that Canada wanted to be called a Kingdom and not a Dominion. From the legal and constitutional point of view also, the term presents difficulties with reference to India. According to the latest declaration by the British Government, a Dominion is not under an obligation to go to the help of Britain in case of War while Britain recognises her obligation to defend a Dominion when it is attacked. Obviously this is based on the assumption that a Dominion is a minor member of the British family. Is it possible that Britain will undertake in the case of India an one-sided obligation of this kind and is it reasonable on the part of India to expect her to do so? General Smuts argues that without the protection of Britain, South Africa can not defend herself against an aggressor. But he would not accept any suggestion from Britain regarding, to take one example, the treatment of Indians in the Union. Great Britain may have her reasons for accepting this position in South Africa. But surely if India wants Independence and wants also Britain to protect it, the latter would be justified in naming her own price for her service. Those who demand Independence, if they are serious, must be prepared to maintain it without any foreign help. The Congress is apparently prepared to face this responsibility. If severance of the British connection is desirable and necessary, India must seek it, devising at the same time measures for defending herself.

Independence and Defence:—Holland and Belgium are small countries but have colonies many times their size. If they are attacked by any of the great Powers, they can not defend themselves. For that reason, they are not prepared nor does any Power want them to become a Dependency like India. Switzerland is yet another instance. Even more crucial are the cases of Poland and Finland. In all these cases, it is agreed that their inadequate resources for defending themselves, is no reason against their possessing the attribute of independence. Is it impossible that India too may acquire a character which would entitle her to be regarded by all countries as being outside their range of aggression? Dominion Status being inappropriate, the only reason which would justify India in continuing in the British connection, is that she can thereby better fulfil her own destiny and serve humanity. We believe that she can do this. If that is so, even if, as is not by any means improbable, Britain, owing to her troubles and commitments in Europe, is unable, however willing she may be, to defend India, our duty to stand with her and to help her if necessary, would remain. But for this, Britain must recognise India as a free nation entitled to an independent place in the comity of nations. This will be altogether a new relation for which a name has yet to be found but which will be found when the time is ripe for it. "Indo-British Entente" seems approximately to convey the idea we have in mind.

Madras Temple Entry Legislation :—We see that the leaders of orthodox Hindus in Madura have decided to send a deputation to the Governor of Madras and, if necessary, to the Viceroy to request them to repeal under their special power the Madras Temple Entry Authorisation and Validation Act passed at the last session of the Madras Legislature. This is a wrong move for several reasons. It is wrong to have a law passed by a Legislature repealed by Executive authority. It is a throw-back in political evolution. The orthodox community, if it seriously wants the law repealed, must wait until the Legislature functions again. The present attempt is bound to be futile. Neither His Excellency the Governor nor the Viceroy is likely to incur the odium which is sure to be exploited here and in Britain of annulling a measure which has been advertised as a courageous act of the Congress Government to remove a dark spot in Hindu society. The fact that this is not appreciated by the leaders of the Harijans who joined Mr. Jinnah in celebrating the Deliverance Day last week, will be cited as showing that the Congress Government had no ulterior political object in getting the Act passed. The Sanatanists are not likely to get any sympathy, much less support, from politically-minded Hindus. The Hindu Mahasabha will certainly not join them. As for reformers they do not believe in temple worship and can not join any movement connected with it. The circumstances and the manner in which this extraordinary law was conceived and carried through, cannot but repel a mind sensitive to the call of fairplay. The orthodox people were treated as dust under the feet. But to a large extent they have called such treatment on themselves. They were deaf to the pleadings of reformers who were keenly solicitous to have essential reforms introduced in the social body with as little violence to orthodox sentiments as possible. They have treated all attempts at peaceful persuasion with supercilious indifference. They are now paying the price. We are sincerely sorry for them. There is yet another consideration. Although the leaders of the Harijans have not appreciated the action of the Congress Government in passing this law, they are sure to raise a hue and cry if it is repealed. And they will be entirely within their rights.

Extension of Separate Electorates :—We publish the first part of a lengthy communication from Mr. K. Chandy. He begins it in the form of a reply to our comments on his scheme for holding re-elections which, he hoped, might result in the displacement of Congress Cabinets. Mr. Chandy deals very lightly with this point. But what he says is enough to show that, if the elections fail, then "he is prepared to go to Hell" with the voter. If this is what Mr. Chandy calls the "secularization of politics," we can only pray that we may be saved from it. His argument that then Britain would realise that the only alternative is between leaving things to the Congress and ruling bureaucratically, is the desperate appeal of an anti-Congressman. The British nevertheless have already decided—to rule bureaucratically. In the several Congress provinces the breakdown of the constitution has its clear lesson to all except those who will shut their eyes to reality. Unable to oppose the Congress election speeches with anything effective—largely because the statements of British politicians leave no room for the Indian Liberal—Mr. Chandy conjures up a triple bogey—Hitler, Stalin and Mr. Jinnah. We shall have to submit to concentration camps and totalitarianism, civil war will come up, and there are the astrological predictions of Cheiro—these are the arguments to address to the voter. Having said this, Mr. Chandy mounts his hobby-horse once more—that a communal majority is different from a parliamentary majority.

Communal and Political Minorities :—It is, to say the least, difficult to follow his argument that if you differ from the majority in political opinion, you have less right to be heard than the other fellow whose father belonged to a different religious persuasion than the fathers of the majority among whom he lives. A political minority's grievances must be dismissed out of hand but a communal minority is tested by the strength of its leader's vocal chords. Mr. Chandy's is not a peculiar case. The British, keen devotees of parliamentary democracy, twenty years ago foisted on us separate electorates with most undemocratic communal weightages. Mr. Chandy, one time enthusiast for secularizing politics, now wants to communalize Provincial and Central Cabinets under the guise of rejecting party government. We do not think that the results of the overweighted communal electorates have been so successful as to justify Mr. Chandy's enthusiasm for an extension of them. No amount of reiteration of the same arguments can convince us that communally-built cabinets will be democratic.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, December 30, 1939.

INDEPENDENCE PLEDGE.

We publish elsewhere the resolution of the Working Committee of the Indian National Congress and the text of the pledge which it has drawn up for adoption by all Congressmen at public meetings called for the purpose on January 26. In issuing these documents, the Committee hopes that none who do not believe in the contents of the pledge will take it merely as a matter of form. Dissentients are desired to intimate their dissent and their reasons for it to the Provincial Congress Committee, not, they are assured, for the purpose of disciplinary action but for the purpose of ascertaining the strength of the disapproval of anything contained in the pledge. This is perhaps the first time that the Working Committee has permitted any doubt to cross its mind as to its sentiments and opinions not being those of all Congressmen. It is to be welcomed as a healthy departure from the spirit of political dogmatism. Not many Congressmen, however, are likely to communicate their dissent and the reasons therefor to the Provincial Congress Committees. The purpose of the pledge is to create an emotional atmosphere favourable to the Congress aim of severance of the British connection. As the Congress has laid down the goal, few Congressmen, speaking generally, will be inclined to scrutinise the arguments by which the foregone conclusion is to be transmuted into the united demand of the whole people. The technique is common to all propaganda, of Communism against Capitalism, of Fascism and Nazism against Democracy, of the Muslim League against the Congress, of the Harijanites against orthodox Hindus, and vice versa. It is necessary for the purpose of propaganda that the other side should be depicted in the darkest colour possible. To admit a single redeeming feature would ruin it. Any one who ventures to suggest that Herr Hitler may not be the lunatic at large that Allied propagandists make him out to be, runs the risk of being dubbed pro-Nazi. To refer in appreciation to the admirable reclamation work of the Fascists in Libya or of the Bolsheviks in the Russian countryside, will bring upon one the charge of being an upholder of Fascist Dictatorship or of Soviet tyranny worse than the Tsarist which used to be a byword before the last war. To dissent from the sweeping assertions about the results of British rule embodied in the pledge, is sure to make a Congressman suspect in the eyes of his fellows even if it does not invoke any disciplinary action against him.

This does not relieve the Reformer of the duty of scrutinising the terms of the pledge. The British Government of India is a foreign rule and has made no pretension to be anything else. According to the accepted political philosophy of Western nations, every foreign rule as such is an intolerable tyranny. This is the principle for which Britain and France, with the United States in the background, are at present fighting Germany and denouncing Russia. Both the Allies are themselves ruling over races and countries not their own. And the world quite rightly asks how the two can blame Germany for the mote in her eye ignoring calmly the beam in their own. The answer implicit in the declarations of Allied statesmen is that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's dictum that good government is no substitute for self-government, applies only to the White races. The Balkan States compared to which the worst governed Indian State is Ram Rajya, come under this doctrine. The aggressor of Abyssinia is now an honoured neutral because Abyssinians are not White men. The Working Committee, however, has not made the foreignness of British rule its main reason for seeking Independence. It impliedly condones that fact, to that extent acquiescing in the discrimination in favour of White races. Its indictment of British rule is based on its iniquity. The pledge declares :

> The British Government in India has not only deprived the Indian people of their freedom, but has based itself on the exploitation of the masses and had ruined India economically, politically, culturally and spiritually. We believe, therefore, that India must sever the British connection and attain Purna Swaraj or complete Independence.

The case for Independence as applying to White races, does not rest on the existence of any grievances on the part of the subject people. The case for freedom, said Edmund Burke, needs no offset of grievances. The Working Committee has not taken its stand on this plain and simple proposition. It has left this comparatively safe ground and has launched a sweeping indictment of British rule which every fair-minded person who is not blinded by political prejudice and party passion must recognise as being in essential respects unfounded and in those in which they are true to be highly exaggerated.

The first count in this terrific indictment is that Britain deprived India of her freedom. The British imperialist who claims that India was conquered by the might of British arms, will find in this a confirmation of his boast. But it is an English historian, Seeley, who declared on an examination of historical facts : "We have not conquered India and we can not rule India as conquerors." However that may be, the impression left on an eminent Indian who spoke with personal experience of the conditions which immediately preceded the establishment of British rule, is of more value than the opinion of political propagandists a century later. Raja Ram Mohan Roy has left on record that he started with an intense dislike of British rule but from a short experience he was convinced that it was a providential dispensation to help India on her way to freedom and national greatness. This view was consistently held and expressed by the founders of the National Congress for over a quarter of a century. Ranade who was keenly alive to the faults and failures of British rule held that the establishment of the rule of law in the place of the personal rule of Hindu and Muslim rulers, was a service which outweighed them in a just estimate of that rule. The religious and social reform movements, the renaissance of Indian art, stand out in high relief. The Women's Movement which is the outstanding feature that has impressed the world in our time, owes its inspiration to British influence. In this and other directions the British regime has been the greatest emancipating force in our history in all spheres of Indian life. It has taught Indians the truth of the Shakesperian precept :

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

> This above all; to thine own self be true.
> And it must follow as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

There is only one word to characterise the statement that British rule ruined the political, cultural and religious life of the country. That word is bunkum. There was no political life in the country worth mentioning before the British period. Cultural life was at the lowest ebb. Religious persecution was rampant and was chiefly responsible for the downfall of the Moghul Empire. Chapter and verse can be quoted from Indian authorities for every one of these propositions. Great Britain is fairly open to the charge of gross neglect of the economic interests of India and even of having subordinated India's industrial and economic life to the advantage of Great Britain. If the Working Committee had confined itself to that charge, it would have been on solid ground. It has prejudiced its case by indulging in hyperbolic language in flagrant contradiction to facts. The whole pledge is vitiated by the wide departure from truth in the hypothesis with which it starts. The Working Committee seems to have taken a leaf out of Mr. Jinnah's book. Its charges against British rule are on a par with his against Congress Governments. If India and Britain have to part let them part as friends and in a spirit of goodwill gladly acknowledging the benefits which they have mutually derived from their connection for two centuries. There is no need to indulge in mud-slinging especially as much of the mud is purely imaginary. If only a fraction of the Working Committee's indictment is true or at least is honestly felt to be true, it will be hard to explain how it has been carrying on negotiations with the oppressor and how Gandhiji happened to intervene in the Rajkot affair as the "Ally" of the Paramount Power.

LORD ZETLAND ANALYSED.

In the course of his statement on the Indian situation in the House of Lords, Lord Zetland observed :

> There is a further consideration to be borne in mind. We speak of Moslems as a minority, because on an arithmetical basis they are less in number than Hindus. But they are a community of from eighty to ninety millions with race memories of days when for 200 years the Moghul dynasty ruled over a greater part of the Indian sub-continent. They have behind them a tradition of military service, which persists to this day and is exemplified by the high proportion of the Indian Army which they fill.

As a general proposition everyone will agree that minority groups should be assured that there will be no discrimination adverse to their interests, religious, cultural, and economic in any system of government which claims to be civilized. But the same is true of the majority. A majority, merely because it is a majority, should not be subjected to differential treatment on the ground of protecting minority interests. Here is a flagrant instance. The Simon Commission which consisted exclusively of British Members of Parliament and was presided over by the present British Chancellor of the Exchequer, in its Report observed :

> It would be unfair that Muhammadans should retain the very considerable weightage they now enjoy in the six provinces (where they are a minority of the population) and that there should at the same time be imposed, in face of Hindu and Sikh opposition, a definite Moslem majority in the Punjab and in Bengal unalterable by any appeal to the electorate.

The Hoare constitution does precisely this. It will be argued with perfect fairness that this has been accepted by the Congress. That does not in the least affect our conviction that weightages which are in effect different grades of citizenship, are a rank poison in any system of administration. Congress having accepted it from motives of expediency is driven unconsciously to look to internal dissensions among Muslims to right the balance. Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and Gokhale who, by the way, were keenly alive to the brighter side of the British connection, were uncompromising in their opposition to communalism in politics. On their death in the same year, the reins of Congress leadership passed into the hands of Mr. Tilak whose political and communal views were totally contrary to those of the departed leaders. He fixed up the Lucknow Pact as a means of securing Muslim support to his political platform. Gandhiji stepped into his place in 1920 and he carried the process still further by the Khilafat alliance. In spite of the Pact and the Alliance, in spite too of Gandhiji's repeated efforts to promote Hindu-Muslim unity and even the offer of a blank cheque, the relation between the Congress and the Moslem League today is one of bitter antagonism. You cannot win over communal opposition by weightages. No more can Lord Zetland win over political dissentients by such considerations as those contained in the passage from his lordship's statement quoted above. There is no difference in principle between the Congress and Lord Zetland's approach to the Hindu-Muslim question. Both are sincere in their objective but both are mistaken in their methods. One of the leading discoveries of the psychology of the subconscious, is that, in a conflict between the Will and the Imagination, Imagination always carries the day. Hindu-Muslim unity will not come by willing it. It will come when some great ideal begins to sway the imagination of India and that ideal must embrace a wider circle than two Indian communities. The method of bargaining for weightages, will invariably tend to widen the gulf between communities. Rather than offer these inducements, it would be much better if the majority voluntarily withdrew from the political squabble, leaving Mr. Jinnah and Dr. Ambedkar or a coalition of the two to run the government of India, if they can persuade Lord Zetland to hand it over to them. It is clear that in Lord Zetland's mind the Hindus have little else in their favour than the accident of being an arithmetical majority. They have no tradition of rule, although as a matter of fact any school book on Indian history will tell his lordship that the British took over the larger part of the country from Sikhs and Mahrattas, and Mussulmans who had revolted against and overthrown the Moghul Empires. In no single battle did the British meet a Moghul army in the field. As for Moghul tradition, there was not one but two distinctly opposite Moghul traditions—the tradition of Akbar and the tradition of Aurangezeb. The one built up the Empire: the other pulled it down. One last word about martial tradition of which so much is made by Lord Zetland and Sir Sikhander Hayat Khan. What is this tradition? If you put any man in uniform, put a rifle in his hand and tell him that if he does not shoot at the enemy he will be shot down where he stands, he will inevitably acquire the martial quality. This is exactly what the Dictators are doing to instil martial qualities among their people. We have been told repeatedly that the British Empire stands for peace and is opposed to militarism. India should like to be frankly told if this is true of British policy in this country or not. Gandhiji wrote that if the British withdrew, the martial races of the north will swoop down on the country and establish their domination. This is an old obsession. That might have happened in the old days when War was a test of muscular strength. Today war is a matter of engineering and mechanical skill and propaganda. Lord Roberts who knew all parts of India well has observed that the southerners are more intelligent than the northerners and are more suited for artillery service. Nations nowadays commission Nobel prize scientists to discover means of annihilating enemies without being annihilated by them. Our only Nobel prize winner in science is Sir C. V. Raman. He has to his credit one Raman effect. Is it beyond the range of possibility that he may discover a second effect by which the brawny northerner when he comes south casts off his martial qualities and seeks admission to his laboratories for graduating in the new Science of War?

PACIFISM AND THE METHODIST PREACHER.

The situation created by the Kristagraha Manifesto is much more serious than it is made out to be by the Methodist Mission. It is, not as that organization would have us think, a question of refraining from any participation in Indian politics. It is the much more fundamental question of whether the Methodist Church in India can discard the message of pacifism which all Methodist Churches have adopted as their own elsewhere. Is the Methodist missionary in India to dilute the pure message of his Church, not because as Paul put it, he wants to give milk to those who cannot bear strong meat, but because he had signed a pledge to do nothing contrary to and in diminution of the lawfully constituted authority? Is the pacifist message of the Methodist Church to be a few plaintive lamentations on "the savage in us," to a few periodic questions asking, "When will war be banished?" We are assured on the best authority that the Government had taken no step whatever. We are glad to hear this. The British Government in England has a great record in the tolerance it has shown so far to pacifists in the present war. No. Frontier News Service regards this attitude not only as a credit to Britain but as an education to other States. We should have been sorry to learn that another policy is pursued in India. The issues in the Kristagraha controversy are clear-cut. The signatories asked for a clarification of the position of those who put into operation the anti-war resolution of the Methodist General Conference. One Section, the ruling section, felt that to do so would be to break the pledge given to the Government of India, euphemistically called the "neutrality pledge." The other felt that its preaching of the Methodist message in full, pacifism and all, was calculated to prepare their members for the new world order which has been declared as one of the aims of the Allies. The natural thing is to appeal to the Government. This the Kristagrahis did. The Viceroy withheld the explanation they had asked for. But the conservative section of the Church took immediate action. Dr. J. Holmes Smith, we learn, is leaving India in "mutual agreement with the Bishop in charge," and no doubt after some time the other signatories too will leave. The Kristagrahis will be held up as a warning to new Methodist arrivals not to interfere in the politics of this country and the Methodist Churches will preach pacifism outside India, while Methodist workers in India will wait in patient silence for "the spirit of God to change men and women into good neighbours." The whole incident would have worked out in a few months to the satisfaction of the Methodist high-priests in India except for a vaguely distasteful memory. Unfortunately for this view of the controversy, however, the Kistagrahis, though less influential in India, would seem to have the American Churches behind them. The 2936 General Conference declared its message in no uncertain terms. It said:—

> The threats of war in the world today are so grave that we feel called upon to restate our convictions on this subject. Therefore, in the name of Jesus Christ, Prince of Peace, and with the hope that His Spirit may be evident in these words we make the following declaration:
> War as we now know it is utterly destructive. It is the greatest social sin of modern times; a denial of the ideals of Christ; a violation of human personality; and a threat to civilisation. Therefore, we declare that the Methodist Episcopal Church as an institution does not endorse, support, or purpose to participate in War.

This is the message—let us be clear about it—which not the Government of India but the American Methodist Mission in India will not allow its members to transmit to their flock. A Government clarification of the meaning of the pledge would certainly be helpful but the next step seems to us to lie with the Methodist Episcopal Churches of America.

WOMEN IN MODERN SOCIETY.

(By. J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Probably the worst feature of modern European civilisation is the increasing tendency of women to postpone marriage as long as they can help it. The disinclination to marry cannot be attributed to late development of sex sense, or to a desire to lead the idealised life of continence or even to a distaste of the company and association of the other sex. For unmarried women by their movements, manners, and posings show keener sex consciousness than their married sisters, and appear to be more eager also to attract the notice and seek the company of the males than the latter. That is, however, not to be surprised at; it is rather nothing but natural that they should be so minded towards the opposite sex. Being sex-satisfied married women, particularly those having children, do not feel any inner unsatisfied urging towards men, and their mind, moreover is pre-occupied with the work and considerations of their families.

The fact is that the two sexes are so strongly and so unalternatively complementary to each other that for the full happiness, which men and women seek through the satisfaction of desires and instincts, not only originating from sex-consciousness but also relating to so many other interests which from the background of life, one sex needs the other, not in casual but in intimate relationship of trust and responsiveness. This essential complementariness attracts and draws them to each other with all the force of their inner nature, and it is very few who can transcend the sphere of this force, by conquering their nature or with the help of religious faith or sacred principles.

Such being human nature, it cannot be good to human society, or to men and women individually to play hide and seek with it. It is not that everybody must submit to be ruled by it; it should rather be one's effort to master it and to continually sublimate it for attainment of human perfection. But without the sincere will to control it and without being inspired by the ultimate goal of perfection, merely to sport with one's strongest innate instinct and to seek its abnormal and indirect satisfaction avoiding the normal and legitimate course, for the reason of temporary inconvenience or because of slavish adaptation of some current notions and tendencies, can only lead to serious potential danger to society. For, the presence within the society of people, living under all sorts of constant environmental excitement but not getting satisfied in the normal and legitimate manner, creates a vicious influence for the others too. And, yet, the craze for ever-increasing industrialisation, which disrupts the economic life of smaller units and groups in the social order, and the trend of modern European civilisation, that looks more to immediate gain and convenience rather than to the stable and lasting goodness, are rapidly swelling the bulk of hungry, sex-unsatisfied creatures to ravish the peace and harmony of the society, without adequate notice of thinking people and without provoking them to serious head-racking for remedy. To be simply told that the thing cannot be helped or that it is inevitable under the tendencies and circumstances of the time, is not consoling; nor does it bring the conviction that nothing can be done to check the current tendencies. Assuming also that no statutory obligation can be placed on men and women to get married within a certain age, and witholding observations, which might be urged on the other side in the case of one or the other above, why cannot social education and propaganda be so directed as to discourage the life, that does not believe in the virtue of strict continence, but avoids matrimony for fear of its responsibilities or for love of romance and adventure?

The life of unmarried women, living by themselves, shows little redeeming feature in it on close observation. They have to work for long hours in offices taking down notes from their superiors and typing them, or as saleswomen to try in all manner to please a customer. These two are their most common professions, though they are also employed as trade canvassers as telephone operators, and as hotel and cafe waitresses. Very few of them are able to take higher class work. For these professions the requisite qualifications are good physical appearance, outward smartness, and ability to appear attractive to men, who are their employers and the chief customers in shops, hotels and cafes. In advertisement of those jobs the above qualifications are even specifically mentioned. The possession of those qualifications is a matter of gratification and self-confidence but I would ask them in all seriousness to think for a moment if their concentration on their acquirements and if their making use of them give them real and lasting happiness or simply lead them from wild hope to depressing disappointment and from fullness of woman's life to its mere unsatisfying waste. To be always thinking how to impress the other sex, and to have constant excitation of nerves thereby cannot preserve nervous balance long, nor can it be something to their nature's inclinations.

Looking thoughtfully at the young unmarried women and at their lot in stalls and offices, where they have to be solicitious of the good graces of the other sex, and where they have even to submit themselves often to improper remarks and attentions of any men, one is filled with deepest pity for them. Forgetful of themselves and in blind pursuit of perverted impulse, so many of them pass away the fruitful years of their youth seeking pleasure and happiness through what they think to be an independent existence, untied to the destiny of a particular man through marriage. But this independence of theirs is only superficial, for they are virtually dependent, every moment of their stall career, on the good graces of their employers, who, in their business interests, have to judge them according to their remaining attractive to the males; whereas in marriage it is not a relationship of employer and employed but that of mutual inter-dependence in faithful trust, love and confidence and with the inspiration of creative existence.

As their youth fades into middle age, and often later, the typists and the stall women feel the ground they had been standing on slipping underneath, and then they usually think of marriage, and feel also the want of children and of a husband to take interest in them. The women come into their own now, but it is rather difficult to settle down in quietness after the distractions of previous years. The preconceived ideas and pre-formed inclinations come in the way of easy understanding with the husband. Husband finding also becomes a problem, for many would be disinclined to marry them and others will not fit in with the pattern which independently living middle-aged women, form of a husband in their mind. Their marriage is therefore, not usually happy, and not infrequently ends in divorce and separation. In the consequent unhappiness and loneliness of their later life most of them regret the folly of their youth and they even warn youngsters against committing the same folly.

Much of the present social unrest and unhappiness in Europe is psychologically traceable to their being large number of women, who lead abnormal life and influence many men also to lead such life. The family bond that makes for social stability is weakened, family responsibilities which control recknessness and induce sobriety and spirit of accommodation are discarded, and family entanglements which do not permit wild speculation and romantic adventure, are avoided. Over and above, bachelor life necessarily lead to moral degration which is at the bottom of all the vices like lust, insatiable avarice selfishness, consciencelessness and so on, the vices which culminate in quarrels, loots, usurpations and warfare. Respectable society should set its face openly and sternly against it in all possible manner: girls should be taught that to live on the good graces of an office boss or shop customers and cafe managers, to win and keep which soul-degrading artifices have usually to be adopted and womanly ideals have to be sacrificed, cannot compare in dignity with the life of an honoured wife and revered mother, looking after her own family and working for its welfare and economic prosperity.

Should some of their thrilling material successes make the European incapable of long vision of human life and of its destiny and should they feel content, inspite of constant quarrels and increasing bitterness in life's struggle, in following the path of immediate pleasantness through indulgence in passing impulsiveness, nothing is to be said; but, if, at last the more thoughtful of them discern more danger and unhappiness ahead, they should, in all sincerity, apply themselves to outcasting from society the unmarried 'Adams' and 'Eves' who go about making sport of moral principle and human ideals. Those of them who for reasons or circumstances of their own, are not in a position to marry must follow the strictest discipline in their life like the Hindu widows, so as not to be excited by evil influences themselves, nor to be instrumental in exciting others. Social taboos and conventions, are more effective in counteracting current tendencies than legislation, and, therefore, if European society will wake up to the necessity of banning conventional spinsterhood, it will quickly arrest its downward fall.

THE CONGRESS AND COALITION GOVERNMENTS.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayam.)

The Indian Social Reformer in its issue of the 16th December wishes to know how I would restrict the issue in re-elections to winning the war, in the event of the Congress not agreeing to resume office under either of the two alternatives suggested by me. It is impossible to restrict the issue, or to expect that opponents of the Congress are certain to be successful. All that was stated by me was that it might be possible, after re-elections, to establish coalition governments, provided that leaders are forthcoming to explain the issues. If leaders are not there with the gift of winning votes, or if the people are not convinced, the experiment fails, and England must either govern bureaucratically, or come to terms with the Congress. The voter is the ultimate authority, and if he chooses to be damned, I must go to hell with him, just as under any other form of government. It is Gandhiji's notion and not mine, to offer satyagraha whenever the other fellow does not agree with me. Personally I am still in favour of a few leaders meeting and coming to decisions, which may subsequently be approved by all concerned.

Similarly, there is no inconsistency, it seems to me, in agreeing to the Constituent Assembly in principle, although aware of its practical difficulties. Those that know the ways of English politicians (vide Pege's letter, for example) assure us that they (the British) pay heed only to practical politics and to actual reactions of policies. What is theoretically right or consistent is not the issue. What I think, or what many Liberals think, is of no consequence. How the Congress and Gandhiji and Pandit Nehru would react, and how Mr. Jinnah and the Moslem League, are at the moment the only relevant factors. When all the cards in a person's hands are shown, there is no subtility intended. As Bernard Shaw said recently of himself, I admit being a coward and having no conscience. In a world which seems to be going mad and of which I know that Gandhiji has not got the key, what I am anxious about is that people of opposing views should some how, any how, cease to hate each other, and should learn to co-operate in order to minimise evil and madness and increase love and sanity.

Mr. Chamberlain's war aims as enunciated by him is not the point, and I do not believe that Chamberlain, or any public school Englishman could explain the war aims with a precision sufficient to satisfy a subtly intellectual Indian. What I know and feel is that Stalin and Hitler are both opponents of values which are dear to me (as to all Indians) and hence, while wishing most earnestly that the war would stop tomorrow, I also wish that Hitlerism and Stalinism no longer threaten the world—concentration camps, poison gas and all that ugly cloud of evil. The two opposing forces are not angels and devils, but erring men, some more so, and my desire is that the policies of the latter would cease to poison life, hence that I support the Allies as do all Indians and as Congress Government ought to have done, if their minds had been less subtle and less calculating.

If the British had been clear and consistent and logical instead of being simply practical and successful they would have perceived many years ago that the League of Nations should be also the International Police, or, failing that, what was necessary for peace was a League of a few strong nations whose policies were generally alike—somewhat like the Sixth Form boys of a Public School maintaining peace among rowdy urchins of the lower class. If either scheme had been adopted after the Great War, there would be peace instead of war today—and it seems to me that this conception is now one of the unexpressed war aims, and also most important of them.

Concerning India, it is pretty clear, putting together various statements that the Britisher is beginning to know that India would be free soon after Hindus and Moslems come to terms. Even a friend of India like Sir Stafford Cripps does not seem to feel that war aims and India's goal need further elucidation.

These were some of the ideas which I had in mind when expressing the hope that either the Congress would see reason, or failing that, India would follow other leaders who do see reason, and who are realists.

I find that the idea of coalition governments, or what I called Panchayet governments, is being attacked from all sides as unpatriotic, undemocratic, out of date, amateur and all that. If, at any time, and under any conditions, the Congress makes terms with Mahomedans, and gets into power without danger of Civil War after British troops are withdrawn, there is no need to consider the idea. The facts that ought to impress the most hard-boiled Congressman are that the Congress regime has given no satisfaction to the vast masses of Mahomedans, and of the Depressed classes. The two leaders, Dr. Ambedkar and Mr. M. C. Raja, have both supported Mr. Jinnah, as also non-Congress Hindus. It is very clear from the utterances of Mr. Jinnah and others, including non-Congress Hindus, that it is on account of the Mahatma having mixed up a particular form of religion with politics that there has accrued all the present mishaps including prayers for deliverance from the Congress regime. If, on the other hand, men like Mr. S. Srinivasa Iyengar, Pandit Nehru and Mr. Bose had guided the Congress during recent years, and had succeeded in making government entirely secular and created confidence that the religions of different communities would be left undisturbed, there would probably have been no trouble. Even a highly intellectual selfless and sane person like Mr. C. Rajagopalachariar made more than one fatal mistake on account of his preoccupation. It is useless to say that they meant well. The reaction on dissentients is the important factor in politics.

(To be continued.)

THE CONGRESS AND INDIA'S POLITICAL GOAL.

The Congress Working Committee which met at Wardha just before Christmas released two resolutions which we give below. The following is the Congress Working Committee's resolution on the political question :—

"The Working Committee has studied with regret the recent pronouncement of the Secretary of State. His reference to the communal question merely clouds the issue and takes the public mind off the central theme that the British have failed to define their war aims especially with regard to India's freedom. In the opinion of the Working Committee, the communal question will never be satisfactorily solved so long as the different parties are to look to a third party, through whose favour they expect to gain special privileges even though it may be at the expense of the nation.

"The rule of a foreign power over a people involves a division among the elements composing it. The Congress has never conscealed from itself the necessity of uniting the various divisions. It is one organisation which, in order to maintain its national character, has consistently tried, not always without success, to bring about unity. The Working Committee is convinced that lasting unity will only come when foreign rule is completely withdrawn. Events that have happened since the last meeting of the Committee have confirmed this opinion. The Working Committee is aware that the independence of India cannot be maintained if there are warring elements within the country. The Committee is, therefore, entitled to read in the British Government raising the communal question as reluctance to part with power.

"The Constituent Assembly as proposed by the Congress is the only way to attain a final settlement of the communal question. The proposal contemplates the fullest representation of the minorities, with separate electorates where necessary. It has already been made clear on behalf of the Congress that minority rights will be protected to the satisfaction of the minorities concerned, differences, if any, being referred to an impartial tribunal.

"Congressmen by now realise that the independence is not to be won without very hard work. Since the Congress is pledged to non-violence, the final sanction behind it is civil resistance, which is but a part of satyagraha. Satyagraha means goodwill to all, especially towards opponents. Therefore, it is the duty of individual Congressmen to promote and seek goodwill. Success of the programme of khadi, as an accepted symbol of non-violence, harmony and economic independence, is indispensable. The Working Committee, therefore, hopes that all Congress organisations will, by the increased prosecution of the constructive programme, prove themselves fit to take up the call, when it comes."

The Congress Working Committee passed the following resolution for Independence Day :—

The Congress Working Committee draw the attention of all Congress Committees, Congressmen and the country to the necessity of observing properly and with due solemnity the Independence Day on January 26, 1940.

Ever since 1930, this day has been regularly observed all over the country and it has become a landmark in our struggle for independence. Owing to the crisis through which India and the world are now passing and the possibility of our struggle for freedom being continued in an intenser form, the next celebration of this day has a special significance attached to it. This celebration must, therefore not only be the declaration of our national will of freedom but a preparation for that struggle and a pledge to disciplined action.

The Working Committee, therefore, call upon all Congress committees and individual Congressman to take the new pledge (given separately) at meetings to be held on that day. The Working Committee advise organisations and individuals to notify their provincial Congress committees of the meetings held as well as the individual or group pledges taken. The Committee hope that none who does not believe in the contents of the pledge will take it merely for the sake of form. Those Congressmen who do not believe in the prescribed pledge should notify their disapproval stating reasons for it to the provincial Congress committee giving their names and addresses.

This information is required not for the purpose of any disciplinary action but for the purpose of ascertaining the strength of disapproval of anything contained in the pledge.

The Working Committee have no desire to impose the pledge on unwilling Congressmen. In a non-violent organisation, compulsion can have little place. The launching of civil disobedience requires the disciplined fulfilment of the essential conditions.

The following is the text of the Independence pledge :—

"We believe that it is the inalienable right of the Indian people to have freedom and enjoy the fruits of their toil and have the necessities of life so that they may have full opportunity for growth. We believe also that if any Government deprives the people of these rights and oppresses them, the people have a further right to alter it or to abolish it.

"The British Government in India has not only deprived the Indian people of their freedom but has based itself on the exploitation of the masses and has ruined India economically, politically, culturally and spiritually. We believe, therefore, that India must sever British connection and obtain Purna Swaraj and attain independence.

"We recognise that the most effective way of gaining our freedom is not through violence. India has gained strength and self-reliance and marched a long way towards Swaraj, following peaceful and legitimate methods, and it is by adhering to these methods that our country will attain independence. We pledge ourselves anew to the independence of India and solemnly resolve to carry out the non-violence struggle for freedom till Purna Swaraj is attained. We believe that non-violent action in general, and preparations for non-violent direct action in particular, require the successful working of the constructive programme of khadi, communal harmony and removal of untouchability. We shall seek every opportunity of spreading goodwill among our fellowmen without distinction of caste or creed.

"We shall endeavour to raise from ignorance and poverty those who have been neglected and to advance in every way the interests of those who are considered to be backward and suppressed. We know that though we are out to destroy the Imperialistic system, we have no quarrel with English men, whether officials or non-officials. We know that distinctions between the caste Hindus and Harijans must be abolished and the Hindus have to forget these distinctions in their daily conduct.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Such distinctions are a bar to non-violent conduct, though our religious faiths may be different. In our mutual relations, we will act as children of Mother India, bound by common nationality and common political and economic interest.

"Charka and Khadi are an integral part of our constructive programme for the resuscitation of the 700,000 villages of India and for the removal of the grinding poverty of the masses. We shall, therefore, spin regularly, use for our personal requirements nothing but Khadi and, so far as possible, products of village handicraft only, and endeavour to make others do likewise. We pledge ourselves to a disciplined observance of Congress principles and policy and keep in readiness, to respond to the call of the Congress whenever it may come, for carrying on the struggle for the independence of India."

NOTES.

A Plea for Fair Dealing :— We are not indiscriminate eulogists of Congress Governments and we do not think that any Government stands to gain from indiscriminate eulogy. Neither is it the function of journalism to indulge in such eulogy. Congress Governments have made mistakes, some serious mistakes. Their greatest and most common mistake has been to ride rough-shod over opposition relying on the numerical strength of their Party in the Legislature. In the leading article in last week's Reformer we quoted from a symposium of the views of eminent authorities on Political Science their views of the contents of Democracy. If one thing is more clear than another it is that a majority is not the essence of Democracy. It is an incident of it and Democracy is essentially much more than majority rule. Majority rule which pays scant regard to the moral and spiritual values which constitute Democracy as understood by eminent thinkers, is little better than tyranny. A majority has no more divine right to rule than Kings. If Congress Governments had paid more respect to opposition views and had not rushed through measures without allowing time for opinion to ripen, and even more if Ministers had all restricted themselves to the conciliatory language of some of them there would not have been far less dissatisfaction with their administration than there unfortunately is. But no fair-minded commentator who has taken the trouble to keep in touch with the main activities of Congress Governments, can fail to see that they have been actuated by the earnest desire to improve the condition of the masses and that so far as communal minorities are concerned, Congress Governments have been extremely, in some cases unduly, solicitous to earn their approbation. No Governments that we can visualise as possible alternatives at the present time, are likely to go farther in these directions than Congress Governments. By so doing they have incurred the hostility of powerful vested interests which Mr. Jinnah is trying to rally to his banner. How far they will respond to his call, will be known after the Deliverance demonstration. A Cave of Adullum has always attractions to many.

Not Sure of Their Ground :— The charge of oppression against Congress Governments fails on a fundamental point: they were not in a position to oppress anybody. The oppressor must be sure of his ground which Congress Governments were not except in unimportant details. Constitutionally they were Ministers of the Governor bound to him by an oath of allegiance and of secrecy. Extra-constitutionally, they were bound by party discipline to the Parliamentary Board and in the last resort to Gandhiji. It was said of old that no man can serve two masters. But most men try to achieve this feat to their own satisfaction and the Congress Governments managed on the whole to reconcile their duties to the Governor and the Board, though at times it must have been very trying. More than this, at a given moment, Congress Ministers were not sure of their own policy. Take the outstanding case of Prohibition in Bombay. When in August last year Prohibition was launched, The Reformer hailed it as the fulfilment of an aspiration cherished for over forty years. A few weeks after the inauguration, however, Gandhiji watered it down by his declaration in the Harijan that what was introduced in Bombay was not Prohibition and that it was a misnomer to call it by that name. We quoted the words of the Excise Minister in the Legislative Assembly to show that the declared policy of Government was Prohibition without mistake. We looked in vain for days for an authoritative statement from Government or at least for a recantation from Gandhiji. Neither came.

More Wobbling :— When the rules were published we were astonished to find inserted inconspicuously one enlarging the scope of exemptions practically to everyone who can produce a certificate or could prove otherwise to the satisfaction of an official that his health would be irretrievably ruined if he were not allowed to continue the use of liquor. The foundation of Prohibition is the conviction that no one's health would suffer if he abstained from drink; that it would, on the other hand, be the better for abstention. When, the first list of exemptees was published, there was an uproar and no subsequent list was published and no explanation was vouchsafed for the omission. Lastly, on the eve of resignation the Excise Minister blandly announced that theoGovernment had subsidised some newspapers in rder to recompense them for loss of income from advertisers having withdrawn their patronage owing to the newspapers' support of Prohibition. Dr. Gilder did not realise that this was placing every paper which supported any measure of Government under suspicion. How can Governments so situated, embark on a policy of oppression of communities with such powerful friends as the Muslim League and the scheduled classes? The Governments have more reason to complain of being oppressed themselves.

"Deliverance Day":—It has not been thought worthwhile to discuss at length in The Reformer —we had a short note on it in the issue of December 9—the call of the President of the Muslim League, Mr. Jinnah, to his followers to observe the 22nd December as a Day of Deliverance from the yoke of the Congress Governments in seven of the provinces. Firstly, because it must be quite obvious to even superficial observers that it is intended to bolster up the charge of "Atrocities on Muslims" against Congress Governments, which has completely failed to convince anybody and threatens to recoil with boomerang effect on the accuser himself. Secondly, prominent Muslim leaders, some of them members of Mr. Jinnah's League, have, with praiseworthy courage of conviction which we should like to see emulated in other political parties, come forward to denounce the Deliverance Day idea as a misconceived and mischievous stunt, derogatory to the Muslim community itself and likely to prove more detrimental to the League than to the Congress. Another reason was that the setting apart of days for the shouting of particular slogans, is nowadays a common feature of political propaganda. Mr. Jinnah's position is indeed difficult. In spite of his allegations of atrocities and oppression, the Secretary of State and leading British statesmen continue to bear testimony to the success of Congress Ministries and to express their regret that they had resigned office. Something had to be done to redeem the situation and the Deliverance Day was evidently designed to counteract the appreciation of British statesmen, including the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India. We quoted in the Reformer of November 11, from a letter from the late Lord Birkenhead to Lord Irwin, then Viceroy of India, that the policy of Government was, in view of the boycott of the Simon Commission by the Congress and the Liberal Federation, to rally Muslim notables to the Commission's support, "leaving Jinnah high and dry." Mr. Jinnah was then regarded as an irreconcilable. Such is not the case now as is apparent from the references by Lord Zetland and his Under-Secretary in the House of Commons to their expectations of the Jinnah-Jawaharlal interviews, which have had to be abandoned. Mr. Jinnah is no longer looked upon as an intransigent. He is rather by way of being looked up to to hold the pass against the Congress.

Dr. Ambedkar Butts In:—Not many days ago Dr. B. R. Ambedkar declared in a statement published in the press his disbelief in Mr. Jinnah's charges against Congress Governments of atrocities against Mahomedans. He has come forward now to support Mr. Jinnah and for a plausible reason for this volte face he has dived into ancient history when the village communities had their own functionaries and the Mahars enjoyed a grant of land for discharging some functions. The Mahars, it is true, occupied a responsible place in the village community. Sir Henry Maine in his "Village Communities" mentions that in all boundary disputes the Mahars were the most important witnesses. Dr. Ambedkar's complaint, so far as one can follow it, is that while other watandars or hereditary village functionaries, have been allowed to retain their holdings though they have ceased to perform the services for which they were assigned to them, the Mahars alone continue to serve the community. If this is a grievance, it is one against the Governments which preceded the Congress Governments. Dr. Ambedkar should show something more tangible to explain his change of front. The Congress Governments have really strained their powers as a non-denominational regime, to remove the disabilities of the scheduled castes, not only in civil life but also in the social and religious spheres. The Bombay Government's decision to withhold licenses from Hindu hotels which refused to entertain guests of these castes, and the legislation in Bombay and Madras authorising trustees of temples to violate the terms of their trust and long-established usage in order to secure admission to members of the antyaja castes, are conspicuous instances. Such oppression as there has been was not of Muslims and the Depressed Classes but of aged, orthodox Hindus who have not been able to drop their deep-rooted prejudices. From ancient times if a group of Hindus felt obliged in pursuance of their conviction to depart from existing forms of worship, they formed themselves into a separate sect, raised their own places of worship and had their own religious heads. This is the traditional way of adopting changes without conflict in the community. Congressmen would have acted thus if they had established their own places of worship open to all classes. Congress Governments in Bombay and Madras, on the contrary, constituted themselves reformers of the Hindu religion and, with the sanction and assent of Governors and the Governor-General, penalised orthodoxy by legislating in this matter. The Congress Governments have gone to the very limit of their lawful powers to help the scheduled castes to free themselves from the disabilities of which they have been complaining. It is, to say the least, utterly graceless on the part of Dr. Ambedkar or any other of their leaders to accuse the Congress of oppressing their communities. Sir Robert Bell remarked in the course of a speech at the last session of the old Legislative Council on a Bill introduced by Mr. Bakhale, that some of the leaders of the scheduled castes seemed more intent on exploiting their disabilities than on getting them removed. Dr. Ambedkar's attack on the Congress Governments colour to that observation.

Caste and Untouchability :—Mr. Kripalani, General Secretary of the Indian National Congress, has explained that party's attitude on the question of caste in his reply to the Jat Pat Torak Mandal's appeal to Congress to take up the cause of the anti-caste movement. The Congress position requires clarification even more after Mr. Kripalani's exposition. Mr. Kripalani said :—

> The Congress policy has so far been confined to the removal of untouchability in all shapes and forms. Our belief is that once untouchability is removed from Hinduism, the caste system will automatically disappear. To raise the question of the caste system on the platform of the Congress would be not to unite the different castes together but to divide them still further by raising a fresh controversy.

If the first part of the message means anything, it means that by abolishing untouchability, the Congress workers hope to break down the caste system and, therefore, they differ from the Jat Pat Torak Mandal only in regard to method. The belief that by breaking down untouchability one can also get rid of caste is open to question. It has no logic behind it. That is probably why the concluding sentence is based on an entirely conflicting view—that many Congressmen who are opposed to untouchability and would gladly work for its removal, are attached to the caste system and their sympathies would be alienated by giving an anti-caste bias to the Congress programme. Mr. Kripalani's reasons for restricting the social programme are marred by over-subtility and they do not accord with facts. He is anxious to present his party's anti-untouchability campaign as a basic attack on the caste system to the Jat Pat Torak Mandal while at the same time reassuring the more conservative members of the Congress that caste is in no danger from Congress reformers. He has been misled into this view by the early reports of the Harijan Sevak Sangh. Had he troubled to inquire of the General Secretary, Mr. A. V. Thakkar, Mr. Kripalani would have learnt on what lines the economic and temple-entry activities of Congress workers have been carried on. The Harijan Sangh reports slowly dropped the earlier assurances that removal of untouchability had no link with antagonism to caste. The Harijan Sevaks had no option in the matter. To take men out of untouchability you have also to take them out of caste. We have always been of the opinion that so long as there is caste there are bound be out-castes and that this social question has to be handled as a whole, not piecemeal. We must congratulate the Jat Pat Torak Mandal on the success which has attended its persistent efforts in the Punjab. A recent press message stated that the Punjab Government had acceded to the request of the Mandal to drop out of certain educational records a column relating to the caste of persons.

Reciprocity Between Dominions and India :—The Council of the Imperial Indian citizenship Association, has passed the following resolution on the subject of enforcing the principle of reciprocity between the Dominions and India :—

> The Council of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association places on record its emphatic protest against the appointment, recently announced, of an Australian, Mr. Claude Scott, as Director of Information of the Government of Bombay, as contravening, to the disadvantage of India, the principle of reciprocity accepted at successive Imperial Conferences for the admission of citizens of the Dominions to India and of Indians to the Dominions. The Dominions, Australia among them, having definitely taken their stand against admission of Indians to their citizenship, India has the right to impose similar restrictions upon Dominion citizens. The Council regrets that the Government of India has not enforced this right to exclude citizens of the Dominions which exclude Indians so far. Whatever might be the reason for this omission, there is no justification for the appointment of such Dominion citizens to positions in the public services. In the case of the Indian Civil Service, recruitment for which is controlled by the Secretary of State, Dominion citizens are allowed to compete on equal terms with Englishmen and Indians. This in itself is a grave injustice to India against which the Indian public have lodged their protest. The appointment of an Australian to the post of Director of Information, which is a purely provincial appointment and entirely under the control of the Provincial Government, is, the Council feels, a serious aggravation of this wrong done to India. It is unfortunate that H. E. the Governor of Bombay should have made this appointment when administering the Province without a Ministry and under the special powers vested in him by Section 93 of the Government of India Act and in spite of the assurances given by the Secretary of State in Parliament that Governors will carry on the administration on the lines of policy laid down by the last Ministry. The Council resolves that copies of this resolution be sent to the Government of India and to all Provincial administrations.

India at the League Session :—Sir Mahomed Zaffarullah Khan's speech at the League Assembly on the resolution denouncing the conduct of Russia in Finland, has received high praise and fully deserved it. He voiced the genuine sympathy felt by all shades of opinion in this country for the unfortunate Finns who for no offence on their part are being invaded and subjected to the worst treatment possible with modern instruments of war. The Soviet system under the guidance of M. Stalin had shed much of its predatory character and had come to earn the respect of the world as a constructive agency for promoting the coming into being of an economic order in which the disproportion between wealth and poverty would be greatly minimised. It was also regarded as a valuable agency in the cause of world peace.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, December 23, 1939.

LORD ZETLAND ON THE INDIAN SITUATION.

While the Viceroy, speaking at the Associated Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta on Monday, excused himself from making any reference to the Indian constitutional problem, Lord Zetland, the Secretary of State for India, on the previous Thursday had made a statement on India with particular reference to the constitutional situation. A brief note on it was all we could find space for in last week's Reformer. Lord Zetland was entirely right in his opening sentences in which he pointed out that German propaganda has failed to make any impression on Indian opinion. Much of the material for it is dug up from old and long-forgotten episodes and mixed with a lot of bombast; and the purpose of it all is to show that Germans are not worse than the British in their methods of Imperialism. This kind of stuff does not interest the people of India. The apprehension of any harm being done in India by German or other foreign propaganda, may, therefore, be dismissed once for all from the minds of British statesmen. India is in a better position to judge the benefits and defects of British rule than any foreign propagandist. We know precisely where the shoe pinches.

Lord Zetland referred to the contributions of the Princes towards the expenses of the War though no appeal has been made so far by the Viceroy for them. We are not quite easy in mind about these contributions and we trust that the Viceroy will continue to refrain from making any appeal to the Princes for war contributions. If it is considered just that the States should help the Paramount Power with men, money and material, a scale should be prescribed according to which each State should be required to contribute in proportion to its resources. We particularly dislike the earmarking by the Princes of their contributions for purposes which catch their fancy. Surely, the Imperial Government is quite able to provide for the survivors of the families of its soldiers and sailors who lay down their lives in its cause. The idea of their being the beneficiaries of what are unpleasantly suggestive of eleemosynary gifts from Princes and philanthropists, is revolting. The Viceroy has repeatedly advised the Princes to deal with the finances of their States, even if there is no popular Assembly to be consulted, on lines which would approve themselves to constitutional theory and practice; and that advice should not be overlooked in making and accepting contributions for purposes even so important as the War.

Lord Zetland then proceeded to deal with the political difficulties in India. His Lordship referred to the differences of opinion between the Muslim League and the Congress, as the most serious difficulty. Lord Zetland pointed out that the Muslim population of India can be called a minority only in an arithmetical sense. We do not know that there is any other sense for the word. India has never made any distinction between communities because of their numbers. The Jews and the Parsis, numerically insignificant, have, for centuries before the British connection, enjoyed the same complete autonomy in religious, social and cultural matters as the Hindus among whom they sought asylum. The Catholic Emancipation Act and the removal of the civil disabilities of Jews in Great Britain, are barely a century old. Persecution of minorities for religious beliefs or racial descent is not an Indian vice. Lord Zetland who has probed into the heart of Aryavarta, should be the last man to countenance allegations of atrocities against the Indian people. The problem of the Depressed Classes stands on a different footing and it is only necessary to say that the Congress has taken upon itself to remove the last trace of discrimination against these classes. During the short two years they were in office, Congress Governments have passed legislation which no other Government would have cared or dared to do.

Although the Secretary of State professed to attach little importance to the arithmetical sense of minority, he could not avoid comparing the numbers of Mussulman members of the Legislatures as decisive of the relative representative character of the Muslims in the Congress and of the Muslim League. There would be some force in this comparison if the Muslim members were elected by common electorates. Elected exclusively by communal electorates, the strange thing is not that so few Congress Muslims got elected but that any got elected at all. The slogans which catch the ear of communal electorates, as Lord Zetland should know, are such as appeal to the crudest emotions of the populace, the typical one being "Religion in Danger." Lord Zetland missed the significant fact that in the Frontier Province with over 90 per cent Muslims, the Congress scored a decisive majority in the Provincial Assembly and that, since the resignation of the Congress Government, it has not been found possible to form an alternative Government as in Assam where the European Planter community holds a preposterously pivotal position.

Lord Zetland's reference to Moghul traditions and tradition of military service, intended no doubt as a compliment, are not likely to be appreciated by the intelligent section, by far the largest, of the Muslims of India. They resent being regarded as exhibits in an archaeological museum since they feel that that implies a direct and distinct slur on their present capacity. There is not a single community in India including the aborigines, who do not cherish a tradition of having once ruled the country or a part of it. The tradition of the Moghul Empire is undoubtedly an inspiring one but the leaders of the Muslim League can by no stretch of historical fancy be regarded as the inheritors of the Moghul tradition at its highest. The real reason for the discriminatory attitude towards Muslims, Lord Zetland mentioned last and as if casually. It is that they furnish a large proportion of soldiers to the Indian Army. The solution of the problem of constitutional reform in India is thus made to depend on military exigencies. If the tradition of military service is such a valuable quality as to outweigh the considerations ordinarily relevant in framing a constitution, what is the sense in fighting Hitlerism which aims at establishing just such a tradition among the German people?

Even in the highly improbable event of the Muslim League under its present leadership, and the Congress, arriving at an agreement, the difficulties of Lord Zetland will by no means be over. There are, of course, said his lordship, > other matters which have to be taken into account. There is the defence of India, our obligations to the Princes and the position which our own people have built up in India by the enterprise of generations, to mention only some of them.

It will be centuries before all these problems and difficulties are overcome, if they can be ever overcome to the satisfaction of the Marquis of Zetland. The minorities' difficulties alone would occupy the best part of a century. The Shias are protesting that they have nothing to do with the predominantly Sunni Muslim League. The Roman Catholics have no common communal ground with the Protestants, and the Protestants themselves are divided into many sects superimposed on their old Hindu castes the memory of which is retained by a large proportion of Catholics and Protestants. The Hindus alone can start a score of minorities. In fact they can show conclusively that they are not a majority but a congeries of minorities. A British statesman who honestly holds, as Lord Zetland does, that political progress must wait until all Indian minorities agree to forget their differences, until all the Princes do likewise and join the communities, and until the British investor in this country is satisfied that he has nothing more to gain from it, can with a clear conscience decline to accept any demand for constitutional rights. The Indian people situated as they are, must accept whatever Lord Zetland says, as final.

But the Indo-British problem has ceased to be a purely domestic matter between Britain and India. it has now become, without any special effort on the part of Indians and owing wholly to international developments, a crucial issue in the world problem. What impression Lord Zetland's arguments would produce on world opinion, it is not for us to say. And there is no need for us to say it, either. Soon enough his lordship and his colleagues will be obliged to answer at the bar of world opinion. The Indian people are not attracted by Hitlerism and they are not likely to be. But to be better than Hitlerism is not itself a very high aim. In the last analysis the demand for self-government is a demand that India should be governed primarily in her own interests, that the army which she pays for and maintains should not be sent to distant places in conflicts in which she has no direct concern without so much as saying, "by your leave," and that full scope should be found for the talents of her children in the administration—that, in a word, Indians should have the same opportunities to serve and to sacrifice in the interests of their country as Englishmen in theirs, as Americans in theirs. Is this too recondite for British statesmen to understand?

BRITAIN AND INDIA.

Addressing the Associated (British) Chambers of India in Calcutta on Monday His Excellency the Viceroy said :

> Despite every effort by His Majesty's Government to resolve doubts as to their intentions for the future constitutional development of India, to make clear their own objectives in the war, to dispel the thought that what is called Imperialism was the dominating motive of our efforts, to bring out the unselfish nature of our aims, difficulties remain unresolved.

It is not only in India that His Majesty's Government's efforts in the directions indicated by Lord Linlithgow, have failed to carry conviction. We reproduce in another column a letter in the New Statesman and Nation of November 25, headed "American Opinion." That journal in its leading article says of the writer of the letter, that he understands the United States as few Englishmen do. Starting with the premise, now generally accepted by all sections of English opinion, that the winning of American opinion is itself a fundamental war aim, the writer goes on to say that American opinion is deeply suspicious of British policy. He goes on to describe the great changes which have come over the American political outlook and stresses the need for Britain to show that there has been a corresponding change in her own. As to how Americans can be convinced that Great Britain is moving in the same direction as themselves, he writes :

> Generalities, since they doubt our ends, are not enough : plausible arguing that any detailed statement of our good intentions is premature, will not impress. What they expect from us is not an indication of what we mean to wrest from our opponents, but of what we mean to contribute ourselves to the new life of which we speak.

That is exactly the Indian position. We want concrete evidence that there is to be substantial advance and no retrogression when the war is won. After the last war, India went through the dreadful experience of the Rowlett Act, and the Jallianwala and Amritsar outrages. Americans without such experiences are profoundly suspicious of British policy. How can India with such experiences feel completely confident in British assurances? It is not that there is any disposition to question the sincerity of those assurances. What is doubted is the likelihood of the existence at the moment of victory of the strength to resist the intoxication which seizes nations as the result of a victorious war. The only way to remove the doubts, is to take some steps at once which could withstand the impact of post-war passions and reduce them to reasonable bounds. Commit yourself at once and irrevocably to a course of action which all the world will understand. Although the writer in the New Statesman does not say it in so many words, it is evident from other sources as well as from the trend of his letter that British policy in India offers the surest way of convincing American opinion. The New Republic wrote of His Excellency's statement on British war aims :

> If the Viceroy's word remains the final one, millions of people throughout the world and in the United States in particular, will feel that the pretentions under which Great Britain has announced that she is fighting this war have a singularly hollow sound.

METHODIST MISSIONARIES AND INDIAN POLITICS.

The American Methodist Mission is apparently putting through one of its periodic "purges." Three American members of the Mission addressed an open letter to the Viceroy on the situation in India and the world. They urged that consistently with their religious convictions they could no longer suppress their opinion on Indian questions which might involve them and the institutions they served in political complications. The Kristagraha Manifesto as their letter is called, has raised an issue which concerns primarily the foreign missionary in India who is asked to pledge himself "to do nothing contrary to or in diminution of the lawfully constituted authority of the country," often interpreted to mean indiscriminating support of the Government, as a condition of missionary service. The Kristagraha signatories question this interpretation and, as the conservative element in the Methodist Mission is in control, they appealed to the Viceroy to give a decision on the subject. Is the foreign missionary by his pledge bound to support every little act of the Government? If he is a Christian pacifist, is he prevented from preaching Christ's message, as he sees it, in its entirety? If he is so prevented, the Kristagrahis ask themselves the final question : Can they continue in the work they have undertaken with these restrictions and withholding from their Church members and from the Indian public what to them appears to be the supreme message of Christ? Nor to them alone but for the whole Methodist Church. For the last General Conference of the Church denounced War as utterly destructive and as a denial of the ideals of Christ.

There is nothing to prevent the Indian Christian or the British missionary from having his own views on Indian politics and from giving expression to them. So far as the non-American foreign missions are concerned this problem does not seem to arise, probably because of the wiser handling of the whole question of politics by the mission heads both in India and in the country of organisation. The frequent occurrence of crises of this kind in the American Missions, and particularly in the Methodist organisation, shows the keen interest in Indian politics shows a sense of panic in the Mission authorities. If the liberal missionaries had the support of their Mission, we doubt whether the Government of India would insist on the literal interpretation of an antiquated pledge. Obviously the pledge of support refers only to political activities to the exclusion of all other work and is designed to prevent missionaries pursuing political (national) aims under the protection of religious preaching. The experience of China is a standing warning to all Asia. The Government of India knew all the tricks of European powers and guarded against them. It was thought convenient during the days of the civil disobedience to use the pledge to check foreign opinion from strengthening the movement, though to our mind it defeated its own purpose. But we do not think that in a perfectly constitutional controversy like the present, the Government of India would be so indiscreet as to suppress American missionaries from declaring their own views, particularly in the peculiar circumstances now existing. It is not improbable that the Methodist Mission authorities in the U. S. A. have taken fright unnecessarily. The interests that have vested in the organisation in India cause a natural anxiety in the home authorities. Much could be done, if the spirit were present, by the controllers of the Mission in India to ease the fears of their American head-office. The rapidity with which events have developed since the publication of the Kristagraha Manifesto would seem to mark the political disturbances of the Methodist Mission as a struggle for power between two rival groups in the Methodist Church, in which the more conservative members have applied the pledge as a weapon against the liberals. They have so far succeeded in persuading the authorities in the U. S. A. of their point of view but at what a cost to the Government of India. So long as the pledge remains, there will be the danger of the Government of India being represented as a less liberal administration than it perhaps is. The removal of such a pledge is from every point of view an advantage to India.

The first ripple was occasioned when Dr. Fred B. Fisher left India on the ground that the atmosphere hindered him from giving his best service. In 1931 a vigorous blow for the freedom of the American missionary was struck by Mr. Gordon Halstead and others who had to leave India as a consequence. Now again Dr. and Mrs. J. Holmes Smith, the Rev. and Mrs. Ralph T. Templin and Prof. Keene, it is reported, will be asked by their mission board to leave the country. This time the issue has raised wider interest, partly because of the greater political consciousness of Indian Christians and largely because of America's key position in world affairs. The attitude of the dissenting American Methodists seems to be more representative of American opinion than that of the Mission heads. "For Americans," writes Mr. H. N. Brailsford in a Fabian tract, "India is the crux, the criterion by which our Empire is judged. In the last war it was Ireland that hung about our necks, like the murdered albatross that cursed Coleridge's mariner." In withdrawing these men from India at a crucial period, the American Mission Board is removing the very people who could the most successfully work with Indians, Christian or non-Christian. While at the same time they increase the difficulties of the task for those who continue in the mission field with an organisation weakened in moral prestige. It is well worth the while of American missions to consider whether they can in common justice restrict the activities of one set of workers to religious subjects while allowing their pro-Government men to range wildly over all political questions. The least that the American Mission Boards can do in the circumstances is to place a ban on all political activities or expressions of opinion while working in India. Those who come out to India in spite of the warning of the pledge, do so in the hope that by eschewing politics altogether they can still be of service to the country. One of the main factors in disillusioning them on this point is the frequent and all too eager support given to the Government by a section of the Methodists. This gives the American Methodists a reputation of being as a class more reactionary than other missionaries, among Indian Christians no less than other Indians. One of the missionaries is reported by the press to have said that they would work for India in America. The most useful way in which this can be done is to convince the American Boards that the liberal-minded missionaries are not so badly off in India as these incidents seem to show. If the progressive Methodists can win the struggle within their organisations against the forces of conservatism, they would have won half the battle.

MORAL REARMAMENT.

Very often a good cause is wrecked by the extravagant claims made by its adherents. Dr. Frank Buchman some time last year diverted his Oxford Group Movement into a new channel and called it "Moral Rearmament" abbreviated into MRA. The new movement has all the characteristics of the Oxford Group. We have received from time to time reports of how great changes have been wrought in communities by meetings held under MRA auspices and, though the communities listed showed little sign outside the MRA camps of any transformation, the speeches of individual members clearly indicated that their own lives were changed. The MRA method, so far as we can make out, gets at individuals by instilling into them a sense of sin and a realisation of their own defects and limitations. It was also the Oxford Group system. MRA thrives best in an atmosphere of optimism and success. There must be many who did not respond to the invitation to confess publicly and be saved. There must have been a good number, in India at any rate, who were paralysed by their sense of incompetence and wrong-doing into inactivity. They do not figure in any MRA record.

In the main MRA's concern seems to be with men and women who are very much in the public eye and whose "conversion" will catch the public imagination. Leaders of society, government officials (specially for India), athletes, all bear "witness" at MRA meetings to the change which MRA has wrought in them. MRA is advanced as a panacea for domestic ills, communal quarrels, race antagonisms, economic strifes, even shady business deals. As one reads the report of one such meeting in Kashmir, one wonders whether MRA had laid hold of a specially bad lot of employers, officials, communalists, etc., or, as seems much more likely, whether the participants suffered from an exaggerated sense of wrong-doing. There are two points of view from which the confessions seem to be more guarded than a first glance would suggest. No "witness" at an MRA meeting has confessed to any wrong-doing which might bring him into conflict with the Law. No trader, for instance, has confessed to giving short weight or selling adulterated stuff; no official to accepting bribes: no communalist to inciting a riot. In the second place, the public abasement of the hitherto proud always ends in placing the witness in a direct relation with God, and so once more better than the rest. Many people seem to have been lifted out of their own pettiness through membership of Dr. Buchman's organisation. We concede that this in itself is no small achievement. What we find uncalled for in the official accounts of MRA functions is the large claims based on very slender facts. Here are a few extracts from the report of the first training camp in India:

> The change of British attitude towards India was shown by.....
> The new homes of India were outlined by.....

And in even more extravagant terms, in the account of the Kashmir camp in the New Witness:

> The change effected in the life of the Indian Judicial Commissioner of Peshawar has been so significant that high officials of Kashmir State and the North West Frontier Province see the pattern for a new India, freed from exploitation, political antagonism and communal strife.

GORAKHNATH AND THE KANPHATA YOGIS*

This new contribution to The Religious Life of India Series is an excellent book of reference in which detailed information on the Kanphata Yogis, the followers of Gorakhnath, abounds. Mr. George W. Briggs has supplemented his work with a fully annotated index, a series of photographic plates to illustrate the more striking features of the sect he has studied, a glossary of religious terms, and an extensive bibliography against which is worked out an elaborate system of initials which, as the reader will find out in the course of his studies, are intimately connected with the footnotes of the text. Mr. Briggs has spared himself no pains in annotating his work so that the doubting reader may at any time refer directly to the source of the author's information.

The chapters of Gorakhnath and the Kanphata Yogis are arranged systematically according to each special point under consideration, and fall under three divisions: A, B, and C. Division. A deals with the Cult in all its working aspects; division B with the historical aspect, the legends and the literature connected with the Gorakhnathis; and division C deals with the system under which these yogis follow their calling. Mr. Briggs draws his own conclusions from this remarkably extensive study in a short chapter, at the end of which the following paragraph indicates the author's opinion :—

> Finally, it is possible to question whether the end which follows ecstatic experience, that is, unconsciousness, or pure subjectivity, or the absence of self-conscious personality, is any more satisfactory as a solution to the problems of life, or as a view of the ultimate goal of man, than is the anti-social character of the whole movement. As meeting the demands of the new day in India itself, both the experience and the goal are insufficient.

The reader of this book is at full liberty to draw his own conclusions from what he reads without necessarily agreeing with the author's views, since the latter sets down practically everything that can be learned from the practices of the Kanphata Yogis; hence, quite impersonally, the work is of great interest, although Mr. Briggs' style belongs to that of catalogues and has a tendency to leave the reader "hanging in the air" with short sentences that could with advantage be strung more smoothly together. Most of the footnotes, not referring the reader to the bibliography, could also with advantage be included in the body of the text because, as they now are, they make even more choppy a manner that is already too staccato. Divisions B and C make much better reading than division A and form a valuable addition and complementary study to the extensive literature that already exists on the subjects of India's religious sects and philosophical system. Out of this emerges a most interesting point, that of the deification of the yogi Gorakhnath, the endowing of him with powers even greater than those of his tutelary God Shiva by a highly imaginative and consequently easily credulous people; and this is not difficult to understand since what the eye can see and the imagination supplement is far more real than anything an awesome but not embodied deity can accomplish through the agency of priests. In other words, what Aunt Mathilda said she saw is far more real and possible than the deeds of Jesus as taught in Sunday School—to give a simple example.

Much that is rather dark and unpleasant is done in the name of the great Yogi by the numerous decadent and corrupt interpretations of his beliefs, says Mr. Briggs—although he is impersonal right through his book, some ceremonies of the Saktis seem to draw him away from this admirable attitude—and he feels that the means by which India's ascetics endeavour to attain their ends are by no means justifiable.

LEADERSHIP IN DEMOCRACY.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Complaints are often made against democratic institutions because of their going under mob control, as it is said, to the exclusion of thoughtful non-party men. That democracy means popular control is well recognised, but where such control tends to lead is not comprehended. When control passes to the people, those who are popular and exert influence with them, must naturally come to power; and to enlarge and consolidate their power they would no doubt seek to have the weight and support of numbers behind them. Qualities of leadership will, therefore, obscure those which may be of a higher order but which do not appeal to the sense and imagination of the common people. And, as the man in the street is not, and in fact cannot be, possessed of very keen perception and subtle discriminating power, thoughtful people who appeal more to the intellect than to impulse or emotion, do not impress him as do those who play on his sentiments, if not also on his weaknesses. It is generally those who are intellectually not much higher than the masses but who are certainly much cleverer than they, who become their leaders. These people possess the knack of organisation and the fighting spirit and stamina for securing and maintaining their leadership; whereas the thinking intellectuals have neither the mentality for roughing it out with rivals for supremacy, nor the desire to descend from their mental plane and to discard their principles and ideals for mass leadership. The deeper and more advanced such thinkers are, the more unfit psychologically they become for party organisation and party leadership. Retire within themselves as they generally do, they prefer, often even not knowing it, to view things from the quietness of distance, from where they get a better and truer perspective, rather than to push and pull through crowds and multitudes. Their nature and their developing mentality tend more and more to make them, what are called, intellectual aristocrats, people whose temperamental reserve and mass-shyness make them unsuitable for democratic leadership.

That, however, is as it should be. For the rush and roar of mass life and the tactics of party organisation are not congenial to the growth and development of fine mental perceptions. And the laws of nature which preserve the physical creation as much as the mental and spiritual are such that the more the mental and spiritual faculties are devoloped in an individual the more nature makes him retiring in temperament and disinterested in putting his hand to the actual field of work. But that does not mean that he is not interested in the world of action. Rather the contrary; for as he derives his inspiration from there, it is that practical world which supplies him with food for thought and gives direction to his imagination and mental keenness. He lives, to all intents and purposes, in that sphere, just like any other man, even unmarked and undistinguished, and yet, his more or less mental detachment to these, what appear to him to be, insignificances of life, though they constitute perhaps the fundamentals of material and corporate life, raises an invisible barrier between him and the common folk. He goes about in the world, but has another ever expanding world pictured before his imaginative mind.

What link is there between the masses and such a philosopher, who sees things from a higher plane than they, and thinks of values and significances, which are not obvious to them? They may admire his sentiments from a distance; they may take inspiration from his thought-currents; but, for entrusting their leadership they naturally feel surer in having those from among them who have shown cleverness and skill in handling and organising their activities, and who come to them making protestations of sympathy and promises of better conditions and a better future. Those people constantly approach them, and without stopping to weigh the words they are using in making those promises or to judge of the reality in the picture of things that they are drawing before them, they carry conviction to the simple mind of the masses, and canvas their support for themselves. It is not necessarily all plain sailing for public leaders and they may now and then, from this quarter or that, meet with opposition, contradiction and even rebuff; but, tough-skinned as they are, neither these nor the tactics, fair or foul, of rivals, damp their spirit or put them in a philosophic mood of indifference to the glamour of public prominence or the advantages of public leadership. Both for public prominence and leadership, fighting tenacity is needed, as also ready adaptability to changing conditions without a qualm of conscience at any reversal of principles, which may be its result.

A deep thinker, on the contrary, is the opposite of one possessed of such qualities. He is thin-skinned and sentimental, easily taking to heart things and remarks, which the other would merely laugh away. He detests the canvassing tricks of his opponent, and is discouraged by the latter's unscrupulous fighting zeal to continue in rivalry. He would not change his position or modify and delete his principles to suit the exigencies of the hour. He quickly feels out of tune with the thundering shouts of the crowd and out of place among the bustling and elbowing multitudes; and, instead of fighting to the last to reach the platform at the head of supporters crashing the gates, he is left behind, or he rather prefers to squeeze himself out and back into the freedom of his world of thinking, where he can revive himself at leisure through soliloquy or writing undisturbed by the din of crowds, or the fury of rivals.

Those thinkers, therefore, who complain of getting no place of leadership in democratic institutions, seem to have neglected the study of their own mentality and psychology while devoting their attention to other matters and to the mentality and tendencies of other people. Had they done so, they would have realised their incompetence and psychological unfitness for leadership in mass organisations.

But that does not mean that they have no part to play in democracy. They have, and they do, in fact, play the most important part by giving to people and their institutions their thoughts, ideas and inspirations, over which human social structure has always been reared and which have always provided the plan and the design of that structure. When things have gone wrong it is the deep thinkers who have seen ahead and have suggested the remedy. When the public mind has lost inspiration, it is they who influenced it and have put inspiring ideals before it. Thus, it is really the thinking men, who are moving and leading the people by their idealism and their thought-strings, though they seem to remain out of them. It is for them to give thoughts and ideas, and for others to work them. If the latter fail to work them to perfection it is again for the former to suggest the remedy and right way. The latter may, no doubt, derive all the advantages from the working, but the former are a thousand times better rewarded by the satisfaction of having contributed to the shaping of human affairs and to the evolution and development of human organisations.

AMERICAN OPINION. *

(By D. M.)

In the discussion of war aims reference has been made now and then to American opinion. I venture to submit that for us the winning of American opinion is itself a fundamental war aim. Its goodwill may help us to win the war, but without it we shall not win a peace that shall abide.

Yet American opinion is deeply suspicious of English policy. What is the reason for this, and how can we break through that mistrust? Only if we start from a realisation of the tremendous transformation which has taken place in American outlook and policy in the last two decades, and much accelerated in the past six years. Since President Wilson, especially, America has turned her back resolutely on imperial expansion. She refused to have any part in the spoils of the World War, and since then she has given up the Phillipines, has withdrawn from Nicaragua, Haiti and Salvador; while the Platta amendment relating to the right of intervention in Cuba was dropped in 1934. But that is not all. In the first of the four distinguished volumes in which he surveyed American foreign policy, the late Mr. Charles Howland found that it rested on four traditions: isolation, the Munroe Doctrine, the open door, and the freedom of the seas. it will be remembered what great weight was given to the freedom of the seas in President Wilson's policy, and how vital for American interests was considered the open door in the Far East. Yet both these old and important traditions have been abandoned, the latter by default, the other deliberately through the neutrality laws, for the sake of eschewing international conflict.

I must go further. The new trend is not wholly negative. For while withdrawing from the outer world, the United States is initiating and furthering in the Western hemisphere ways of economic, social and cultural co-operation which go beyond anything tried in Europe or through the League of Nations. The "good neighbour" policy is being worked in earnest; and even the sacrosanct Monroe Doctrine has been transformed by the Declaration of Lima, on the initiative of the United States herself, from a one-sided protectorate into a common responsibility; it has, in other words, been made a principle of collective security. Now, all that is but the international aspect of a new social philosophy. Adumbrated already a generation ago in Wilson's "New Democracy," it flows now in full spate through Roosevelt's "New Delhi;" and the bird's-eye view which Charles and Mary Beard give of it in "America in Midpassage," shows that it is nothing less than a full-blooded social revolution.

Can we do nothing to touch the heart of the new and generous outlook in America? Generalities, since they doubt our ends, are not enough; plausible arguing that any detailed statement of our good intentions is premature, will not impress. What they expect from us is not an indication of what we mean to wrest from our opponents, but of what we mean to contribute ourselves to the new life of which we speak. Nothing prevents us to do that. And such an offer, however limited, would in their eyes be at last a token that we really have at heart a new world, and not merely a new map.

Allow me one last word. There is one aspect of American opinion which makes such a gesture on our part still more urgent, and that is the curious fact that French attitude and policy are hardly ever mentioned. For America, British policy alone seems to count. And, since that fits in with what the Germans and the Russians say about the nature of the conflict, there is a real danger that the idea of its being war between two imperialisms may become, if anything, more widely accepted.

* The New Statesman, November 25.

THE ANTI-MALARIA AEROPLANE.

Sometimes in the vicinity of Delhi a Fox Moth aeroplane may be seen flying over the inundated regions. It advances slowly in a straight line, and one has the impression that it is following a line previously drawn, whilst throwing out seeds on furrows covered with water. The aviator is not a farmer: he is employed by the Indian Anti-Malaria Administration.

The authorities who carry on the fight against malaria know that besides intensive treatment by quinine of malarial sufferers, other precautions must be taken against the malaria mosquitoes, that lay eggs by the million on the waters of the inundated regions round Delhi.

It is necessary to destroy the larvae produced by the malaria mosquitoes and it is for this purpose that this aeroplane carries on each flight 153 kilogrammes of an arsenical product that is distributed over the marshes by means of an automatic spray. This treatment does wreak great havoc amongst the larvae.

The work carried out by the anti-malaria aviator is difficult and not without danger, for he is obliged to fly very low and as slowly as possible. During his first flight, he inhaled such a large quantity of the atomised toxic product, that he was obliged to wear a gas mas during subsequent flight.

In this way the anti-malaria battle is being waged on two fronts. The malaria mosquitoes are destroyed by technical means and quinine kills the malaria parasites in the bodies of the human sufferers. Quinine is a natural product, without which the whole of humanity would already have become a prey of malaria. Boundless are the efforts by which the authorities try to rid India from this terrible disease. The recommendation of the Malaria Commission of the League of Nations prescribing a dose of 15 grains to 20 grains of quinine per day during 5 to 7 days for treating an attack of malaria and the taking of a daily dose of 6 grains of quinine as a preventive during the entire fever season, has also been brought to the notice of the population of India. On page 124 of its report (English edition), issued in 1938, this same Malaria Commission stresses the fact that the harmlessness of quinine makes it a suitable drug for administration by subordinate personnel without constant medical supervision, whereas such supervision is essential in the case of synthetic products.

GENEVA AFFAIRS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With reference to your comments in the last issue of your valued paper regarding Reuter's message about German girls swarming the premises of the League of Nations with a view to persuade the delegates of the smaller nations to champion the cause of peace on certain lines, from what I have seen in a Tamil weekly the whole message is only a counter joke to the German gibe about English 'Tea Girls' landed in France.

While I have very much enjoyed and appreciated your wise and sagacious comments during the last few months about the characteristics of Pandit Jawaharlal and his likely future role in Indian politics, I am sorry to observe that for once he has become your better in level-headedness and keenness of observation in his comments about the recent exploits of Russia.

Bombay, December 17, 1939. } Yours etc. S. RAMASWAMY.

[We do not know to what comments of Pandit Nehru our correspondent refers. If it is to Russia's fears of being attacked at Leningrad, the Finnish Government had expressed itself ready to grant a subsidy for the fortification of that city.—Ed., I. S. R.]

INDIAN STATES AND THE PRESS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

While skipping over an "Independent and Non-party" Delhi paper I was surprised to see many articles on the Indian States. On perusal I found out that most of them are of the propaganda type. Those who are responsible for this propaganda want to throw dust into the eyes of the reading public by creating a false impression that the concerned States are nothing but miniature heavens of the world. This subject cannot be brushed aside since this disease is eating away the vitals of healthy journalism.

The policies of many papers are higly influenced by the advertisers and those who give annual subsidies. Most of the journalists do not care to murder truth for fear of offending those State authorities and advertisers. Notable Indian dailies refrain from publishing any news about the true situations in the States and in this way the reading public is kept in the dark. Even those journalists who are famous for their trenchant and fearless views make very guarded criticisms, to avoid hornet nests round their ears. Vernacular journals have also fallen a prey to this disease. If the present state of affairs is allowed to continue, in course of time the journalist is likely to be dubbed as a professional propagandist whose main ideal is to earn money.

Udipi, 14th December 1939. } Yours etc., K. HYDER.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, t is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Russia and the League of Nations :—The League of Nations has been galvanised into activity after a long period of incubation. The League Council met early this week and decided to send telegraphic messages to Russia and Finland to cease fighting and to submit their dispute to the League for arbitration. Finland accepted the proposal at once. Russia refused on the ground which she had advanced earlier in protest against the League's intervention, that she was not at war with Finland and there was no dispute for the League to settle! Russia has set up a People's Government in the part of Finland which she has occupied and will not recognise the Government at Helsinki as a lawful government. This plea was overruled by the League Council but Russia sticks to her view. Over a million Russian troops have been massed at the scene of war. Mongolian troops, it was reported last week, were to be sent to the front as they were better able to endure the Arctic cold than European Russians. It may also be that the Soviet Government hopes that as "blood brothers"—Finns and Estonians are of Mongolian race—they would readily fraternise with the inhabitants. A Committee appointed by the League Council has drafted a resolution condemning Russia as the aggressor and recommending member States and non-member States to help Finland with armaments and food. There is no doubt that the sympathy of the larger part of the world is with Finland. Russia's invasion of this peaceful and innocent country, is nothing but an act of brutal violence. But international relations are still very much governed by the jungle law; and we doubt if the call of the League in this instance will evoke more effective response than in the case of Italian and Japanese aggression on Abyssinia and China. The League could not pass any resolution against Germany for its absorption of Austria and Czechoslovakia, as Germany had withdrawn from the League, and the two major powers, Britain and France, had acquiesced in it. Russia is still a member of the League but its delegates are not attending the League session although they continue to remain in Geneva. Meanwhile Germany, which seemed inclined to sit on the fence, has found this seat uncomfortable and has jumped down on the side of Russia. The only power which can at present effectively intervene to divert Russia from Finland is Japan, if she can be persuaded to embark on a vigorous offensive in Siberia. But she too is not in the League, and it is only by abandoning China to her that she can be induced to help Finland. Another of the terms is the co-operation of all the Powers with Germany in opposing the Bolshevisation of Europe. As a matter of fact, almost simultaneously Germany proclaimed her sympathy to be with Russia in Finland.

Disingenuous :—Facts are sacred, comment is free, declared a great British journalist, should be the guiding principle of honourable journalism. A Reuter's message conveying the news that Germany has sent journalists to Geneva with certain peace proposals to be conveyed informally to the members of the League of Nations Council, seeks to prejudice the offer beforehand by insinuating that the Nazis hope to bribe the smaller and poorer States with money and tempt their delegates with women, into supporting them. We quote the words of this extraordinary message:—

> A number of so-called journalists from Berlin is in attendance in the League corridors, accompanied by a bevy of attractive girl secretaries, and with evident authorisation of unlimited expense accounts, in the hope of influencing the delegations from small States who might relay the suggestions for an early peace on Hitlerite terms to the Allies.

In the first place we doubt if it is the fact that Germany has made or intends to make the offer of the terms stated in the message. All later messages are in conflict with this forecast. These terms include a plebiscite under international auspices for Austria which has never been mentioned in the peace terms outlined from time to time by British and French statesmen. The latest news is that the League Assembly has unanimously passed the draft resolution condemning Russia's aggression and expelling Russia from League membership. The alleged terms offered cannot be much exceeded if Germany had been already beaten in the war. It would be an act of incredible irresponsibility for the Allies to reject offhand an offer of peace if made on these terms. It is clear that Reuter represents the view of some people who do not want an early peace and who are afraid that the British and French delegations at Geneva may be led to consider peace with Germany, and who want to prevent them from doing so. It is not difficult for those who know something of recent history to guess what these are. The smug assumption that the small States are more amenable to corruption than the larger ones, is not only unfair to them but contrary to facts. It is the smaller States, in fact, that have stood up for principles while the larger ones have compromised on them. The British Broadcasting Corporation made no mention of Reuter's Geneva revelations.

Pacifists and Conscientious Objectors:—We publish this week an article sent to us by the No-Frontier News Service on the position of pacifists in belligerent countries. The lack of any news from abroad on the progress or otherwise of the pacifist movement tends to impress on the average reader that the whole organisation has collapsed on the outbreak of War. In the twenty years that have intervened between the close of the last War and the outbreak of the present one, however, there has been a continuous stream of propaganda from pacifists all over the world. No longer is it possible for those who resist war, even in the remotest countries, to do so under a sense of isolation. With the growth of the movement into a full and complete world organisation, there is every probability that men who shrink from either inflicting or suffering physical violence, will take refuge in it along with those who renounce on principle war as a method of deciding international differences. We do not see what is wrong in this. The institution of committees to find out why a man does not want to take part in a war and to exempt some while forcing others to the battle, seems meaningless. Either one recognises the freedom of the individual or one does not. There can be as little justification in forcing a man whose mind and every fibre of whose being shrinks from war, to the front, as there is in compelling the conscientious objector. It is a fine tribute to British statesmanship that No-Frontier News pays in saying that Britain leads in an enlightened handling of the problems rising out of the conscientious objector.

The "Hindu":—The Hindu of Madras was the recipient of numerous felicitations from far and near, high and low, on its completion of its sixtieth year. The occasion was signalised by the removal of the Hindu offices into a new and spacious building planned and built according to the requirements of a great modern newspaper. The messages received together with an illustrated description of the new building, are issued in a special bulky supplement. The Hindu has its representatives in all the capitals of the world, whose communications have a special value as studies of questions from the Indian point of view and in their bearing on Indian problems. The Hindu's opinions expressed in its leading articles are not perhaps so clear-cut as they used to be in its earlier missionary days; and old readers may feel tempted to recall Lord Salisbury's admonition to his nephew, Lord Balfour, in the days of his political apprenticeship, against the temptation of youth to be among those of whom all men speak well. All over the world the daily newspapers have left the task of forming and leading public opinion to periodicals produced at more leisure which gives time for deeper reflection. The success of the Hindu, which is unique in Indian journalism, owes nothing to such adventitious aids as competitions with large money prizes and other devices, summed up in the phrase "coupon circulation." The Hindu does not find room even for the ubiquitous crossword puzzle. It owes its success to the solid, sound sense and understanding with which it has sought to thread its way through the labyrinthine mazes of public life in our day. We wish the Hindu ever increasing prosperity in the years to come.

Dominions and India:—Apropos of our note in last week's Reformer on the appointment of an Australian as Director of Information of the Government of Bombay, the principle laid down at Imperial Conferences is summarised as follows by Professor A. B. Keith in his "Constitutional Law of the British Dominions" published in 1933:

> The relations between the Dominions and India stand on a distinct footing from their relations inter se. This depends essentially on the fact that, while there is normally freedom of intercourse between the Dominions though each exercises the widest power of exclusion of other British subjects at its discretion, the Dominions definitely have closed their doors to the immigration of Indians. The principle of such exclusion has been recognised by India on the score of the right of each part of the Empire to regulate the composition of its own population, and to follow such policy as may best accord with its own views as to the wisest method in which to build up its social and economic structure. The principle of inter-Imperial equality, however, has one satisfactory effect. It has induced the Dominions to recognise that they may be subjected at pleasure by the Indian Government to similar conditions of exclusion to those which they impose.

The Indian Government has not deemed it expedient, or has not been permitted, to exercise this right as regards the admission of persons from the Dominions into India. Dominion citizens have the same rights as British born citizens to enter the Indian Civil Service whose recruitment is regulated by the Secretary of State. The Directorship of Information, however, is a purely provincial appointment. If an Indian Government were in office, it would not have gone to a non-Indian—certainly not to an Australian. As we said last week, the issue is essentially a political one. It is whether India should employ Dominion citizens in posts in which Indians would never be employed in the Dominions and in which they are not even admitted. In whatever way the future position of India is decided or decides itself, we suggest that it is not well to stress the servile status of the country in the Commonwealth in the manner in which such appointments unfortunately do at present.

Elections to Constituent Assembly :—The accusations put forward against the Indian Civil Service by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru are not altogether unconnected with his fervent advocacy of a Constituent Assembly. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru is a keen student of international affairs. He has not lost sight of the fact that, in all methods of ascertaining popular opinion, it is important not only to know that every adult has the right to vote but also to make sure as to the supervising authority. The methods of coercion employed in Central European plebiscites, it is true, are not likely to find favour with Indian election officers. But at the same time the prestige of any Government in this country is considerably higher than in Europe. With the extension of the vote to large masses of illiterate people, as the Congress scheme of Constituent Assembly contemplates, the influence of the party in power will greatly increase. This consideration makes it imperative to bring about a change in the Centre before the convening of a Constituent Assembly and within the shortest possible time to impress on the Services throughout, the effectiveness of the change. The advantage, moreover, from a political point of view, in casting doubts on the efficiency of the Services now lies in putting them on their defensive. The Congress politician has never worried in opposition about problems that might arise out of his agitation when he steps into authority. Then, of course, the Ministers who are now silent, will turn on the full measure of their approval on the Civil Services. Some Congress newspapers have sought to explain the Pandit's criticisms by reducing them to one of inadaptibility to Indian nationalism. Pandit Jawaharlal, however, has repeated his attack and said he meant incompetence. A new political phrase has been brought in, we notice, in the Civil Service controversy, "friends of the bureaucracy," by which all those who express surprise at the Pandit's onslaught on the Services which only yesterday were lauded by the Congress Ministers, are condemned out of hand.

Mr. Jinnah and the Congress :—Oppression is hateful by and on whomsoever practised and if there is any the least justification for Mr. Jinnah's complaint that Congress Provincial Governments had committed atrocities on the Muslim minority, they should be exposed and Congress leaders called to account for their misdeeds. All the Congress Ministries concerned have categorically denied Mr. Jinnah's allegations. Not content with that, Mr. Rajendra Prasad, President of the Congress, had invited Mr. Jinnah to place his complaints for examination before the Chief Justice of India, Sir Maurice Gwyer. Mr. Jinnah's reply was to the effect that he wanted the Viceroy to decide on the issue and that he had, therefore, placed his grievances in His Excellency's hands. We, along with others, certainly understood it to mean that he did not accept the Congress President's suggestion. But Mr. Jinnah has denied that this was the right interpretation of his reply, and his denial must of course be accepted. More recently Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel has revealed that on his instructions the Congress Prime Ministers had requested their respective Governors to tell them what they thought of Mr. Jinnah's allegations; and that all of them had declared that they were unfounded. (In passing the constitutional impropriety of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel making public, communications between Governors and their Prime Ministers which the former have not thought it desirable to publish and the latter under their oath of secrecy on taking office are precluded from publishing, can not but shock any one who recognises the existence of proprieties in politics.) Whether with Mr. Jinnah's charges hanging over Congress Ministries, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru should meet Mr. Jinnah and carry on negotiations with him, is a question on which Gandhiji and Sardar Patel seem to differ somewhat, the former holding that it would be improper for Mr. Jinnah to do so, if he believed in his charges, and the latter, that it would be wrong for the Congress to conduct negotiations unless the charges are unconditionally withdrawn. Since the above was written, the Pandit has declared that he would not resume his talks with Mr. Jinnah in view of "recent developments." In a public meeting in Bombay Pandit Nehru made it clear that he meant the demonstrations which Mr. Jinnah, as President of the Muslim League, has called for the 22nd, to express relief and gratification at the resignation of Congress Ministries. Even if Mr. Jinnah agrees to call off the demonstrations, the charges will still remain.

Lord Zetland's Speech :—Lord Zetland's speech in the House of Lords on Wednesday represents a closer approach to Mr. Jinnah than his previous speech. On the present occasion the Secretary of State for India took up and enforced Mr. Jinnah's contention that though numerically the Muslims are a minority in India yet their number 80 millions added to their memory of having been once rulers of the country, entitled them to be treated otherwise than as a minority. This is a feather in the cap of Mr. Jinnah and would have materially strengthened his position in the talks with Pandit Jawaharlal which have now been abandoned. Lord Zetland has no doubt taken the hint from Lord Salisbury during the last debate on India in the House of Lords that in view of the International situation the Moslem problem in India had a more than Indian significance.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, December 16, 1939.

DEMOCRACY AND THE CITIZEN.

While Europe is witnessing a struggle for supremacy between European democracy and dictatorship, thoughtful men are asking themselves what democracy actually is. The old cliches have ceased to convey any meaning and in many American universities there has sprung up an earnest endeavour to get at the fundamentals of democracy. There have been several discussions in Columbia University alone on the subject, the latest reported being the Congress on Education for Democracy held last August. There were, as there were bound to be, some speakers who lent heavily in their addresses on the evils of totalitarianism. But, on the other hand, there was for the great part much said that badly needed saying. By far the most significant of the addresses touched on the time-factor in democracy. Three speakers laid the greatest emphasis upon it. Dr. Charles A. Beard Surveying American Democracy, remarked :

> If immediacy is an essential element of democracy, than America has never been and is not now a democracy. In no sovereign matter does the snap judgment of a majority or a plurality given at a mere moment have the force of law. Our system in respect of great issues allows for the time element and guarantees that prudence and daring, conservatism and radicalism, may each have its day in court, that discussion and education may intervene, that pleas and counter-pleas may be heard, and that decision may be matured.

Lord Stamp in a message from London in answering the general complaint that the democracies were slow to move in contrast with the quick decisions and rapid action of totalitarianisms, pointed out aptly that > except in a contest there is no special virtue in speed of decision or action. If democracies generally should take by their processes six months to determine a course of action, and in doing so feel a sense of satisfaction, completeness, social rightness—well, why not let them? Life in society is long and a day or a year are a small matter in the long run. A constant sense of urgency and imminence, a constant fever for decision in the shortest time is not among its best values.

Reiterating this message, Dr. Fred Clarke of London University referred to > the quality which I call Simultaneity, a certain impatience with time and a readiness to scrap and rebuild, to plan and construct on broad sweeping lines. It is almost as though the third dimension, that of depth, had dropped out of history and out of popular consciousness, so that a kind of engineering technique comes to take the place in social control and social construction of those powerful if less palpable traditional influences which operate so strongly in old countries. The change brings gain as well as loss.

We must not forget, however, that no totalitarianism—and all of them have succeeded some measure of democratic government—has stepped in because of the slowness of democratic processes. All of them have been built on the failure of democratic regimes to face up to the problems confronting them. In Europe these problems have in the main been economic and the democratic regimes fell under the weight of vested interests. In his message to the Congress, Mr. Ernest Bevin who insists that democracy must not be confused with the maintenance of a particular form of economic or financial system but that it is itself a condition which allows for change, reaches agreement with Lord Stamp's dictum that democracy is a direction of development rather than a state. This being so, a static democracy is a contradiction in terms and automatically makes way for other systems. "Let us not," said one speaker at the Congress, "delude ourselves with the naive notion that people in some countries have lost their freedom because they welcomed regimentation and concentration camps as desirable things. They lost their freedom because they did not know what to do about the practical issues which the new technology had created. They were easy prey for those who offered them scapegoats to explain their plight and promised to save them from humiliating insecurity and poverty." It might be useful to add here by way of corollary that no one believed these promises were within the bounds of fulfilment. But given the choice between the democrats who promised nothing and in fact admitted that a way out of the prevailing social and economic chaos was not clearly discernible, and the totalitarians who offered to perform the longed for miracle, most people had little hesitation in plunging headlong into the experiment. The remedy for the dangers that threaten from Fascism or Communism is education and yet more education—not democratic propaganda but, in the words of Dr. Clarke of London University, education which induces "patience and wise restraint." There is at present much of the first among us but very little realisation even of the need for the second. Lord Baldwin and Lord Eustace Percy both pleaded in their messages for the spiritual content of democracy. Some of the speakers who had experience of religious and communal differences, mostly American, sought some formula for religious tolerance which would not blur religious distinctions. From the reported speeches, however, there seems to have been very meagre consideration of what for Europe and America has proved the greatest problem of political democracy—the assurance of economic securiry. The great task of democratic statesmen, said one speaker, was to realise, and spread the realisation among the people, that the citizen was not opposed to the State nor the State antagonistic to the citizen. This was the nearest approach that was made at the Congress to the fact that under modern conditions the dangers that lurk in money power are greater than any that may be inherent in political power. As a matter of fact, the distrust of the ordinary man and of many intellectuals for the power of government has been greatly instrumental in creating an atmosphere favourable to the exploitation of all the other parties by business interests.

MR. CHANDY AND THE CONGRESS.

In his article on the Constituent Assembly last week, Mr. Chandy suggested that if Gandhiji and Mr. Jinnah cannot be persuaded to agree to a working agreement on the minorities issue, and if, further, the Congress refuses to accept the scheme of coalition governments both in the Centre and in the provinces or to resume office and help in the prosecution of the war by serving with other parties in a central War Cabinet, the totalitarianism of the Congress would be well established. The practical result he hopes to win out of this, is re-elections which would break the Congress politically by making the war an issue in the elections. Should the voters not think as Mr. Chandy does on the need for supporting Britain in this war, then it would be conclusively proved that they do not possess the "necessary mental discipline" for Democracy. So many people have been discovering that Indians are unfit for Democracy that it would not matter if Mr. Chandy's suspicions are confirmed. We do not think, however, that Mr. Chandy himself can lay much claim to democratic thinking if he is prepared to respect the voter only so long as he votes in accordance with Mr. Chandy's wishes. We would like to learn from Mr. Chandy how he proposes to restrict the issues at an election to the question of co-operating in winning the war. British statesmen have been trying hard to bring this about but the Congress demand for a declaration of war aims has raised other questions which appeal more directly to the Indian voter. Then again, Mr. Jinnah has raised some issues against the Congress and at the time of elections there will be a regular deluge of local grilances which will flood out the war issue. Unless the Government conduct coercive elections on the "yes" or "no" manner of European plebiscites, we do not see how Mr. Chandy's elaborate scheme is to succeed. Mr. Chandy has made it clear in earlier articles that he does not believe in the Constituent Assembly. Had he kept to that he would have done well. Here he has tried with much subtility to argue that, even though he does not believe in it, he and those who think with him can turn the tables on Congressmen by taking them at their word and using their own methods against them. We would remind Mr. Chandy that liberal democracy in Germany failed not because of its inaction or ineptitude but just because of the overweening and misplaced confidence of its leading men, many of them of undoubted ability, in their capacity to use and outwit their opponents. Here in India the Congress Ministries often floundered in their attempts to find a middle path between wrecking and working. What is needed in Indian politics and world politics is not increasing complications between intention and action but a straightening out of the existing tangles. Let those who do not expect the Constituent Assembly to yield results, frankly say so, instead of accepting the idea with mental reservations.

MR. GANGULI'S INDICTMENT OF AMERICA.

We publish today an article from our valued contributor, Mr. J. M. Ganguli, criticising the United States for their attitude to the warring world in Europe and Asia. Mr. Ganguli blames President Franklin Roosevelt for his frequent messages exhorting the nations at variance to settle their differences peaceably by negotiation and not to resort to bombing civilian populations if they decided that they must settle their disputes only by the arbitrament of arms. His Holiness the Pope has closely followed the President in similar exhortations. Latterly, the Presidential and Papal messages failed to evoke anything more than a courteous acknowledgment from those to whom they were addressed. Even this was not vouchsafed until after a long delay by Herr Hitler and M. Molotov on the most recent occasions. The Presidential vocabulary also, as we have ourselves noticed more than once, was not strictly within the bounds recognised in communications between Heads of States. His Holiness the Pope, of course, was extremely careful in his choice of words. There is much truth in what Mr. Ganguli says about the failure of President Wilson to give practical effect to his fourteen points. The manner in which he manoeuvred to defeat the Japanese amendment postulating equality of races in the world situation contemplated by the League of Nations, was not exactly what was expected of a man of his lofty character and principles. He had no illusions in the matter himself and his last days were clouded with suffering with pain and anguish which his bitterest critics can not but regret. Mr. Wilson's great mistake was to have gone to the Peace Conference himself. Mr. Ganguli also overlooks the fact that after the last War it is American scholarship and American love of probing matters to the bottom, to which we chiefly owe the revelations of the shady side of the history of the last War. Notwithstanding all their errors and failures, the United States are never deaf to the call of idealism though, owing to their remoteness from Europe and Asia, they can not easily give practical effect to their sympathies. As for the trade in armaments, Mr. Ganguli forgets that but for America the non-aggressive nations would have been at a considerable disadvantage against the Imperialist Powers. America is not Providence and there is a limit to what gold, of which she has the largest quantity of any nation, can do. After all, every nation must guard its own freedom and culture and in every case America's moral sympathy has been with those who struggled against odds to do so. Another point to be borne in mind is that the groups in the States which are most articulate are, as in other countries, not always those which represent the tradition and genius of the American nation. On every moral issue, the real America can be counted upon to be on the side of right.

PACIFISTS IN WAR.

(No-Frontier News Service.)

How many conscientious objectors will the new war reveal? In the United Kingdom during the World War, there were some 16,000, many of whom accepted alternative service but many of whom also refused to do any kind of work they thought would promote war. There were not many in France, and the few that manifested themselves in the Central Powers were speedily and ruthlessly disposed of for the most part. In France, there were not a few who simply eked out a miserable existence for the long years of the war, and none too forthrightly, by hiding in the forests, subsisting on berries and game and occasional meals picked up at the cottages of sympathizers. Even in Great Britain the treatment of "C. O. 's" was often harsh.

If a measure of any civilization is perhaps its treatment of sincere war resisters, Great Britain, so far at any rate, is showing a sense of responsibility and calm judgment about its many, many pacifists. If the war goes over into more bitter phases, perhaps this present tolerance will give way to a severity more akin to that shown by dictated countries. But many pacifists themselves express appreciation for the amount of understanding shown by the authorities though they state that the tribunals established to hear the plea of war resisters are often fatuous, increasingly inconsiderate, and characterized by little depth of intellectual comprehension.

It is known that two conscientious objectors, at least, have been executed in Germany. In France the distinguished novelist, Jean Giono, has been imprisoned for "defeatism," though of course defeatism is not even a fractional part of his philosophy, which is essentially the same as that put forward in 1914 by Romain Rolland. Rolland, incidentally, having married a Communist wife at an advanced age, and having changed his point of view in many ways, has been saying — at least up to the revelation of Russia's true policy in recent weeks — that he must support the war. The French newspapers are filled with thinly disguised reports of arrests and persecutions of "unpatriotic" Frenchmen, and it is a certainty that the growing pacifist movement has been sternly crushed. Even long before the outbreak of war, France, in the name of democracy, was suppressing its pacifist elements.

But in the early days of the war, at any rate, Great Britain has on the whole manifested toward its sincere dissidents a consideration which deserves credit. The veteran pacifist, George Lansbury, has pointed out that Mr. Chamberlain himself having long been a Unitarian and being made to understand in England what it is to receive a certain amount of scorn for a minority position, has shown a personal understanding of the pacifist point of view which has occasionally caused concern to his more hard-boiled colleagues.

With the tightening up of the British censorship, no doubt pacifist utterances will be few and far between, in the public eye. But not even the widespread antipathy to everything represented by the Nazis and their acts, has moved the bulk of British pacifists from their conviction that war is untenable and that this one was not necessary; that all the opportunities to create a basis of enduring peace were left untried at crucial moments because French and British imperialists were unwilling to make major adjustments or sacrifices.

Not only do the authorities thus merit a certain amount of praise for their official attitudes to date, but so do those who have responsibly, and with poise and firmness, upheld in Britain a point of view which will be submerged for the duration of the war, but almost positively will arise with increased vigour once the war is over. Not only are these pacifists maintaining their intellectual position, but they are busying themselves with all sorts of good works, both in an effort to perform any healing function that they can, short of assistance to war, and to convince their fellow-countrymen that in no true sense is their philosophy one of mere negation. Lansbury, for instance, has been heading up a Polish Refugee Fund, particularly to help children.

The fellowship of Conscientious Objectors has raised its age limit for members, in view of the draft which extends from 18 to 41 years of age; to cover all actual or potential war resisters.

The tribunals are revealing sufficient numbers of war resisters to surprise those who had convinced themselves that once the war drums rolled, practically all of the war resisters would fall into line. Canon Stuart. D. Morris, Chairman of the Peace Pledge Union, lost no time, after the outbreak of the war, in making his position clear. "We renounce war," he said, "and refuse to support or sanction another. We cannot sanction this war. We cannot approve of it. We do not believe that it is a just war. We do not believe that it is an inevitable war. Our pledge to humanity must stand...We have always advocated constructive proposals which we still believe could have saved Europe from this tragedy. If we have failed to avert the tragedy of war, we must try to save peoples from the tragedy of another peace similar to the last."

James Maxton, representative in Parliament of the Independent Labour Party, in opposing the Conscription Bill, said, "I enter my protest against the belief that war can achieve things. We are particularly against the view that any good can come to working-class people in any of the countries in Europe as a result of armed force either in this country or any other."

The Executive Committee of the National Peace Council has issued a statement to its affiliated organizations and to all individual sympathisers. "It can never have been of greater importance," it asserts, "that the influence of what we call 'the peace forces' should be maintained to its fullest extent than it is at this moment of war. The essential duty, therefore, of the peace movement and of the individual peace worker is at all costs to maintain unimpaired the vision, of a peaceful and co-operative world, to resume with a new dedication of spirit the task of reconciliation, and to labour unceasingly in the encouragement of every effort aimed at the promotion of a constructive peace."

No fewer than 300 delegates met in Glasgow, on Sunday, September 10, under the auspices of the No-Conscription League, resolved to work for independence of labour and anti-war organizations, for free speech and press; for respect towards individual anti-war convictions whether political or religious, and for the education of the public toward the ending of hostilities, with a constructive peace, at the first opportunity. Members of the governing committees include prominent representatives of the Women's International League, the Neutrality League, the Independent Labour Party, the Peace Pledge Union, the United Socialist Movement, the Co-operative Women's Section, the Society of Friends, and numerous other movements.

Expressing penitence for the "failure of its efforts to commend the Gospel of Christ's redemptive love and suffering as the more excellent way," the Council of Christian Pacifist Groups, through Canon Charles E. Raven, Henry Carter and G. H. Macgregor, has published a statement on the war which goes on to declare: "It is manifest that in these last days a spirit vastly different from that of 1914 has been revealed. Many in all nations, if they are not yet ready for the renunciation of their lust for power and reliance in violence, are deeply convinced of the wickedness and folly of war; of its destruction of all the true values of life; of its challenge to the personal and ecumenical claims of Christ's religion. Whatever the outcome in terms of national victory of defeat, the issue will be determined by the extent to which the fruit of the Spirit is fostered or corrupted. We see that today this conviction is felt far outside the ranks of professed pacifists."

If the various belligerents really wish to impress neutral countries with the superiority of their cause and conduct, one yard-stick that will be applied to their professions, both by thousands of pacifists all around the world and by many who are not pacifists also, will be the degree of their civilized responsiveness to such sincere appeals and activities as these. Thus far, assuredly Britain, if far from perfect, nevertheless comes off comparatively with honour.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Though she has been diligently benefitting herself through political turmoils and wars outside her borders, it is very strange that America should yet pose and make a show of humaneness and love of peace. During the last Great War, President Wilson started issuing manifestos expressing American abhorrence of war and man-slaughter and concern for the return of peace in Europe. On the eve of the present war, President Roosevelt also assumed the role of peace-lover, and issued appeals to certain persons whom he took to be at fault, to desist from warfare. But, during all this time, armament factories in America were in full operation, turning out war materials for shipment to quarrelling parties in Europe. When war actually broke out, those factories were worked overtime to increase their output, and American commercial magnates keenly busied themselves in securing orders from belligerent countries.

No doubt with considerable grandiloquence the country proclaimed its neutrality, but that was of course not to be allowed to stand in the way of its increasing war business with Europe. The sharp business acumen of the Americans evidently made them capable of putting up with anything—particularly in the nature of high-pitched moral sermons—except what might be restrictive of their trading interests. And, therefore, following the Rooseveltian broadcasts and the trumpeting of the Neutrality Act, the lifting of the embargo on arms supply to warring countries was incorporated in that Act. Even an embargo on a thing like poison gas was successfully argued against in the Senate, on the ground that its supply to one side would tend to deter the other side from its use in fear of reprisals.

To appreciate better American international philosophy, the Wilsonian days may be recalled again. After the world had heard nice sentiments about moral justice and human equality, and a comprehensive enunciation of the fourteen cardinal points, on which peace in Europe, and for the matter of that in the world, could stand with prospects of stability, it found America itself jumping into the war as soon as its trade with the Allies was threatened by the German submarines.

When the war was over, President Wilson proceeded to Europe to participate in the Peace deliberations, and to influence them, as it was supposed and expected by the defeated side as well as by the world outside, according to the principles embodied in his fourteen points. But those principles fizzled out and even the question of racial equality was effectively shelved and avoided in the settlement of issues arising out of a war, in which coloured races had shed blood as well as the white races. Moreover, the principle of self-determination, which he and his Versailles colleagues postulated and introduced into the enemy territory to weaken and break up the Central European Germanic bloc, was kept unapplied to countries of the non-European peoples, including the former colonies of Germany, which, with their population, were transferred to other masters, just as herds of cattle are given over to their purchasers in a market without any reference to their wishes and sentiment.

Thus the American President discharged the responsibility of translating into action the moral philosophy of his country in its international relationship, which it had professed and supported.

The freedom movement of countries like India, Egypt, Arabia, or Africa which has never received any support from America, and their political subjugation which has not evoked any condemnation by that country, need not be referred to here in further amplification of American internationalism and American sense of human justice. But, the Chinese war, which has apparently excited American sentiment against Japan, may be mentioned in passing. While denouncing Japan, President Roosevelt and his country said not a word to those holding territorial and all sorts of concessions in China which were obtained during that country's days of weakness and disorganization. These concessionists who excited natural jealousy in China's close neighbour, Japan, and whose monopolies and special rights and privileges stood in the way of Japan's interests, were not asked to forego their acquisitions in order to present Japan with an incontrovertible argument against her aggressiveness in China even though such concessions had no moral basis derivable either from any historical precedent or otherwise.

When again, Abyssina was taken by Italy, American moral sentiment evaporated in the heat of trade activity stimulated by the Abyssinian War.

America is a country, which had scope for building a culture and civilisation on new ground, detached from the old world, and uninfluenced by its prejudices, narrowness, entangling historical traditions and existing commitments, relationships and obligations. It is inhabited by settlers who wanted to leave their motherlands, some in disgust, some for adventure, some with ambition for prosperity, while still others in quest of peace and of a new culture that could suppress the unpleasant memories of the old and give the freshness of a new outlook; but all with enthusiasm for building something new, something great, something inspiring. The conditions for founding a great culture were thus present. A great thought, a deep realisation of the real human values, penetrating vision through and down to the bottom of the European materialistic civilisation, revealing its essential faults and shortcomings and its incapacity to bring the human flowers to perfect blossom,—that only was required but it was sadly missing. Perhaps the immigrants consisted only of business adventurers and exploiters, and not of any great thinker. The result was disastrous. The innocent age-old native population was driven out into the wilderness or beyond the sea coasts to meet its fate, and the evolutionary culture of the land was trampled down under the feet of the new-comers who proved to be incapable of rearing up a better culture in its place.

Such has been the evolution of the New World civilisation, different aspects of which are reflected in the life and living of the Americans and in their relationship with the outer world. If it is to be allowed to follow its present course, it will have nothing to contribute to American welfare, not to say of human welfare; but, if it has to be turned to different direction, then much hard thinking will be necessary, by at least those Americans, who can transcend the infectious trading mentality of their countrymen.

SELF-DETERMINATION AND INDIA.

(By R. Srinivasa Aiyengar, Coimbatore.)

The agitation for the application of the principle of self-determination to India started soon after the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms were set in motion, and was conducted by the Moderate politicians in organizing the National Convention. Though the terms 'Constituent Assembly' was not then used, the demand for Britain's recognising the principle of India's right to self-determination had the backing of distinguished politicians of the Liberal school of politics. The non-co-operators of these days are fighting to-day for the same right by their demand for the Constituent Assembly. The Rt. Hon. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri communicated his views to 'New India' in 1922 for almost the first time about the application of the principle of self-determination to India:

"I would, at an early opportunity, probably on the eve of the next elections, which is only next year, persuade the Central and the Provincial Legislatures to appoint a Convention for the purpose of formulating a definite scheme of Dominion autonomy. I should hope that the Convention would include from the new Legislatures the most eminent men in the country who would have sought and obtained election. If by chance any eminent men were excluded from the new Legislatures they might be co-opted by the Convention or requested to attend as advisers. But the principal point is that the scheme would embody the best wisdom in the land, and be the work of the duly elected Legislatures. It could then be claimed for the Constitution that in a sense it was the result of Self-determination. In fact it appears to me difficult to conceive of Self-determination in any other sense as applicable to India, provided only the scheme reflected wise and statesmanlike opinion in India, and not the immature and unrestrained doctrines that find acceptance in tumultuous gatherings."

An editorial signed by 'Publicus' in the "Servant of India" commented on the above views of Mr. Sastri that if the Convention should have a chance of success, a declaration must be made by the Government of Britain that the scheme formulated by a duly constituted Convention would be placed before Parliament for adoption with such changes in detail that may be considered by the legal advisers of the Crown. The essential principle behind the demand made by the Liberals in 1922 and that of the Congress Working Committee today is more or less the same, though there are differences between the composition of the National Convention and that of the Constituent Assembly. Yet the response from the British Government even two decades after the late President Wilson's broadcasting the theory of self-determination, is not forthcoming.

An important issue now raised by Mahatma Gandhi in connection with the constitution of the Constituent Assembly is that the British in India should not claim to be a minority community. This issue is not altogether new, but was strongly pressed by the Liberals. The Rt. Hon. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri wrote in "The Servant of India" in 1925, "The spokesman of the European Association (Col. Crawford) would indeed have discovered an indefeasible charter for delay if cooperation between Hindus and Muslims could be made a statutory condition for further reforms. The view is almost universal that the Britisher in India has no useful part to play in the settlement of the differences between the two great communities here. For many reasons the British community, especially the official section, still enjoy so much moral prestige and initiative that a large part of the Muslim population in India lean on them as a protection against the supposed tyranny of the Hindu majority. Politically the bureaucracy could tilt the balance still in their favour and put off the day of unity, if they would. Their example as a privileged community has a legitimate influence on the Muslim attitude. If they stand apart from the rest of the Indian people, refuse to coalesce with them, speak in scornful terms of a political nationality even in the future, and insist upon separate electorates and a disproportionately large representation, it is idle to pretend that they preserve neutrality and keep the balance true. As teachers of democracy in this country, the British community should voluntarily forgo their privileged position in our franchise law." A study of the history of our agitation for Swaraj in its various phases would indeed be very interesting. Gandhiji is now reiterating only what a distinguished Moderate politician urged in powerful language fourteen years ago—that the attitude of the British community in India should no longer be one of acquisition and consolidation, but of general renunciation, and salutary example in the subordination of communal to national interests. This revised attitude will be in accord with and hasten the day of recognition of India's rights to Self-Determination.

MONGOLIANS IN FINLAND.

A Reuter's telegram last Saturday reported that the Soviet Government were sending Mongolian troops to Finland as they are able to stand the Arctic cold better than Europeans. The following interesting account of the Finns and Estonians (both of Mongolian origin), their conquest by German knights, who converted them to Christianity and serfdom, was published in World Youth (Boston) of October 28:

Early this month observers were startled by another turn-about-face by Hitler, apparently acting under orders from Stalin. Soon after the Russians became dominant in the Baltic countries, it was announced that Germans in Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania would be repatriated by the Reich. This is a radically different approach to the German minorities problem from that pursued, for example, in Czechoslovakia.

The Baltic Germans—15,000 in Estonia, 62,000 in Latvia, and 40,000 in Lithuania—have been for centuries the main land-owning, aristocratic group in these countries, with an almost unbroken record of exploitation of the native people. Presumably they are to be settled in Polish Pomorze and Poznan, territories taken from Poland last month.

These Baltic Barons are as a group descendants of the Teutonic Knights who entered the Baltics in the Middle ages, seized property and authority under the guise of Christianizing the heathen who had inhabited the land from time immemorial.

These "heathen," were the Finns (now numbering 3,843,000) and the Estonians (now about 1,126,000), who belonged to what is called the Ugrian race, distantly related to the Hungarians and the Turks, a branch of the Mongolian race. In Latvia the "heathen" to be despoiled were the Letts (now numbering about 1,950,000) and the Lithuanians (about 2,540,000) who both belonged to the Indo-European racial group.

There were two groups of Teutonic Knights. The Knights of the Sword were first in possession. Their headquarters building, dating back to 1201, still stands in Riga, Latvia.

After these, came the Knights of the Cross, who had been fighting with no success against the Saracens in Palestine. They went up into the Baltics and found there simple peasants with good land, and established themselves in Marienburg on the Vistula. Making serfs of the Baltic peoples who remained alive after a period of deliberate extermination, the Knights of the Cross acquired great wealth and fame which they kept for centuries. They mastered the whole Southern Baltic and dominated East Prussia until 1919 as feudal lords of the cruellest sort. When Russia owned these countries (for about a century) the Barons nevertheless continued in power under an agreement made with Peter the Great. The Baltic nations became free after the war. Their independence was recognized by Communist Russia nineteen years ago, and their Governments broke the power of the landholding barons.

MECHANISATION OF AGRICULTURE.

An article by Mark A. Dowber headed the "Sharecropper" in the Zion Herald reproduced in World Christianity (which to the regret of many readers has ceased publication with the current issue) sums up some of the consequences of the Mechanisation of Agriculture in the U. S. A. Mr. Dowber writes :

> The rural landscape is strewn with abandoned houses, or, as in a section of Kansas with which I am personally acquainted, the farm homes are being pulled down to avoid taxes. Residents in Western Taxas explain as they point, "There used to be ten cropper families on that farm. The tractor got nine of them." "That farm has made a living for a dozen families, ever since the land was broke; now only three are living on it and two are getting just enough to get by. The tractors are keeping our families from making a living." Rural schools decline. Village merchants fail. Drought and poor cotton prices have undermined them. Class bitterness is stirred, and even the government programme intended to benefit the farmer has been an instrument of strife. This is the story of the machine riding ruthlessly over the lives of people, bringing bitterness and despair. Others not yet dispossessed are facing the same stark fear.

New machines are on trial and when they are perfected the results will be still worse. Mr. Dowber writes :

> The future displacement of sharecroppers when the mechanical cottonpicker shall have been perfected is well recognized. The serious displacement now in progress in the wake of the all-purpose farm tractor has been scarcely noted. Yet tenant farmers and farm labourers—whites and negroes alike—are being swept from the land and on to relief in some of the most important agricultural sections of the country.

What is the remedy? The prohibition of the use of labour-saving machinery is out of the question. Men must be relieved from the drudgery of physical toil before they can be educated to and have leisure for higher things. The remedy seems to lie in either co-operative or collective harming. The latter is being tried in Soviet Russia. In the United States co-operation with State aid seems to be finding favour. Mr. Dowber writes :

> The Farm Securities Administration is taking steps to assist there dispossessed tenants and share croppers to get a new start on Government-owned land. Under the Bankhead Jones Farm Tenant Act, it is buying farms and is experimenting in rural rehabilitation with various kinds of co-operative farm programme. The sharecropper colony at LaForge, Missouri, is an excellent illustration of what might be done in a more general way to solve the problem. Here one hundred former sharecropper families are located as tenants of the Government and are operating fifty-acre tracts which were part of a former plantation. The results of this project to date more than justify the adventure. A more stable agriculture is being established, and the former sharecropper has a feeling of greater security; he is better fed and housed and is coming to believe that he has a future. It is along some such lines as this LaForge project that the future of the tenant farmer and the sharecropper will lie. If the problems that are arising from mechanical agriculture and the evils of a one-crop agriculture are to be overcome, it will require the aid and guidance of government or private initiative.

"RIYASAT" ON THE "SERVANT OF INDIA."

The Editor of the Riyasat, Urdu weekly of Delhi, courteously sent us a comment as meriting our special attention. The following is an English translation of it :—

> We have painfully heard the news that the Servant of India, the official weekly organ of the Servants of India Society after serving the country for twenty-one years is closed down.
> The Servant of India was one of those journals of which Indian journalism in future will be proud. The paper rendered very great service advocating the establishment of responsible Government in the country, by raising the voice of Democracy to greater heights and towards the mitigation of social evils. One event, in the annals of the paper, will be writtten in prominent letters. The publication in the paper of only one article in connection with the Bawla murder case was the cause of the dethronement of Maharaja of Indore. In plain words Lord Reading was so impressed by the article that he invited the Maharaja to appear before a Commission of Inquiry. Accordingly, we remember that the late Mr. D. Nursingh Rao, the then Prime Minister of Indore, confessed to this writer that the article was entirely responsible for the ruination of Maharaja of Indore.
> The world has gone far ahead during the last twenty years and though Mr. Natarajan, the Editor of this journal, is one of the best journalists of India, the Servant of India continued to be published in the same poor (common, ordinary) form namely with a few pages and in a small size. The result was that there was a difference in its popularity. It could not keep pace with the world and the world deserted it and in consequence it was forced to close down.
> If it is possible it behoves the members of the Servants of India Society to restart this paper and with sufficient funds they should keep it alive along with other good and dignified papers so that this useful paper may be able to serve the country in future as well.

The reason for the Editor sending the article to us is evident in the mistaken reference to the Editor of the Servant. The credit of the achievement attributed to the Servant of India's single article belongs to Mr. S. G. Vaze for many years its able and intrepid Editor.

NOTES.

War Precautions:—The Bombay Government issued some days ago a statement explaining the need of dimming lights in Bombay. It was a wise and thoughtful statement. If it had been issued by the Congress Government, it would have been put down to want of administrative energy. The statement said that Government preferred the method of persuasion to that of punishment. The people of Bombay are not anxious to court annihilation by enemy bombs and they will not need much persuasion if they felt that there was imminent danger of it and that the methods recommended would be effective as a means of protection. Even in England where they are close to the scene of danger there is considerable discontent at the measures enforced as war precautions. The other day a distinguished retired Indian Civilian who had acted as Governor of a province, committed suicide after shooting dead his wife and his dog, one of the reasons given for his frenzied state of mind being the discomfort caused by billetting evacuees—a new word for the slum women and children transferred to the countryside in view of enemy bombers. Several letters in the Spectator and other journals complain bitterly of the hardships caused by this arrangement. The evacuees themselves are not happy and several of them are said to be returning to their homes preferring the chance of bombing to the mental distress caused by the break-up of family life. Lord Baldwin's opinion that there is no certain protection against air-raids except raiding the enemy-towns yourself, is endorsed by Bertrand Russell who cites expert authority. A correspondent points out that dimming of lights is a useless precaution as the enemy will be guided not by street lights but by maps and mathematical calculations. The Government statement admits that on moonlight nights, Bombay can not be rendered invisible to enemy ships at a distance of forty miles. But the moon does not leave us wholly for twenty out of thirty days in the lunar month. The special A. R. P. officer said in one of his broadcasts that the danger from gas attacks is not serious in Indian cities where there is plenty of open spaces to shift into. Worli in some evenings nowadays gives one a good foretaste of a gassed locality. While precautions are necessary, they defeat their own purpose when they are much in advance of the actual danger. People get tired and when the danger is actually upon them they do not remember where they kept their gas masks. If the ten virgins in the parable had kept their lamps lit many days before the bridegroom's coming, they would have exhausted their oil and would have been found sleeping at their posts when he came.

War Propaganda:—The London correspondent of the Times of India, Sir Stanley Reed, in his letter published on Monday said somethings about war propaganda, which very much needed saying. "I am growing to hate the word propaganda," he wrote. "For one reason I feel in my bones that its importance in neutral countries is overdone." Not only in neutral countries but also in parts of the British Empire, like India, where the emotional background which is so easily worked upon in the belligerent countries, does not exist with reference to this War. Among informed people who have read the literature pertaining to propaganda in the last war, there is a general distrust of all war news as propaganda. Persons who eagerly turned on the radio at all hours of the day in the hope of getting some news, have given up listening-in as waste of time. There is very little news but many extracts from speeches and newspaper articles. Even more than the liar, the propagandist has need of a good memory. If he finds it necessary to recognise the existence of a person whom he had announced as dead some days ago, he should at the least offer a few words of explanation as to how he came to make the mistake. If he were speaking at a public meeting, he could be heckled. On the air, the listener is entirely powerless to interrupt any torrent of mis-statement that may be inflicted on him by the man at the microphone. In India the feeling generally is that the Allies will win the war but there is anxiety about the state of mind which they would bring to the task of peace-making. If any propaganda is needed, it should concentrate on this point so far as India is concerned. So far there has been no endeavour made by British broadcasters to understand and respond to Indian requirements which are not the same as British or Canadian or Australian. For instance, informed opinion here is more affected by the Russian raid on Finland than it was by the German raid on Poland. The reason is that Poland by its grab on the occasion of the German occupation of Czechoslovakia, showed itself to be no better than the aggressor; whereas Czechoslovakia and Finland have proved themselves to be peace-loving nations the loss of whose independence is a loss to the cause of world peace. We suggest that it will be worth the while of the B. B. C to expand, if necessary, its personnel, so as to interest India in its broadcasts. If it be thought necessary to repeat and answer allegations regarding Indian conditions by Berlin or Moscow, it would be better done by someone who can produce a less clever but more accurate answer to the allegation of the existence of 40 million unemployed in this country. The B. B. C.'s reply was that there can not be 40 million unemployed in a country where there are only 25 million employed!

Russia and Europe :—Russia's aggression on Finland has overshadowed the War in Western Europe. The latest press messages state that three countries are helping Finland with war materials—the U. S. A. which has suspended the next payment of Finland's war debt, Britain and Italy. More, the Italian aeroplanes are being despatched, it is said, through Germany. Is it possible that we are to see, sequel to the undeclared war of recent years, an undeclared peace between the belligerents of Western Europe in resisting the encroachments of Soviet Russia? Even Japan after having set the pace, has denounced the Soviet State as guilty of wanton aggression. The Scandinavian countries which were considering how best they could give expression to their disapproval of Russian methods, are now apparently inclined to give active help. In this they have doubtless been encouraged by world opinion which has been unequivocal in its denunciation. Finland has appealed to the League of Nations which seems to be once more functioning as a political international organisation. Soviet Russia, however, refuses to recognise the constituted Government at Helsinki and has signed a treaty with a "People's Government" set up immediately after the first Russian invasion of Finnish territory. The treaty, the terms of which, we presume, were also offered to the Helsinki Government, contemplates an exchange of some 70,000 square kilometres of Soviet land for 3,500 square kilometres of Finnish territory and compensatory payment on a liberal scale by Soviet Russia. This shows clearly where the gulf exists between Russia and Finland. The Soviet negotiators apparently acted on economic calculations. The Finns have falsified once again the basic assumptions of Marxian theorists. The "People's Government" which is of doubtful representative value in so far as it came into being only after the Soviet invasion and on Soviet-occupied territory, issued a manifesto demanding the setting up of a parliament elected on equal, universal, direct, adult and secret franchise. It failed to declare under whose auspices the elections would take place. Political developments in the past twenty years have shown that it is as important to know who conducts an election as to ensure who votes at the polls. The first week of conflict has clearly revealed the Soviet fear of Leningrad being bombed from Finnish territory to be an irrational one. If it had been real Soviet Russia would have thought twice before launching out on its present policy. No one can deny that the provocation to retaliate has been great to the desperate Finns. If the Helsinki Government was made up of irresponsible desperadoes as Soviet propagandists would have us believe, Leningrad would have been in ruins by now.

Bombay Sales Tax :—His Excellency the Governor who is in sole charge of the administration since the resignation of the Congress Ministry, has decided not to enforce the Sales Tax on mill-made cloth which the late Ministry had levied as a part of its scheme for financing Prohibition. Though the Legislature had sanctioned the levy, arrangements for giving effect to it were not made when the Ministry went out of office. Many objections had been raised against the tax. The chief one, however, to our mind, is not the inconvenience to the trade but the incidence of the tax which, as in the case of indirect taxes generally, would be heaviest on the poor. Cloth as a necessity of life is on the same plane as food in the case of the poorer classes. The least increase in price will make itself felt among them. The actual amount of the Sales Tax is no criterion of the amount which the public will have to pay in consequence of it. Retail prices are always much in advance of wholesale prices and the addition due to the tax, 6¼ per cent, will mean about double that ratio to the poor consumer. For this reason alone the tax was objectionable even though the cause of Prohibition, which it was meant to serve, is a good one. The Tax was expected to bring in Rs. 25 lakhs in a full year and about Rs. 10 lakhs this year. But, owing to the difficulties connected with the collection, nothing has been so far collected on account of the tax. These difficulties are aggravated by the prevailing conditions. What the Governor has done would most probably have had to be done by the Congress Ministry if it had contained in office. We are not told how his Excellency proposes to meet the loss of revenue. The house tax and the special petrol cess have been collected on the understanding that the proceeds are to meet the loss on Prohibition. If for financial reasons the Governor thinks of suspending Prohibition as has been done in Bihar, it will be unfair to continue the levy of the rest of the taxes intended for the specific purpose of maintaining Prohibition. Since this was in type, it is stated that the loss on account of the Sales Tax involved in enforcing Prohibition, will be made good from the unexpended sum of Rs. 25 lakhs allotted to Village Improvement in the last budget. It is a thoroughly irregular arrangement to earmark large sums for projects which can not be in a sufficient state of preparation for being taken in hand six months after the passing of the estimates.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru :—It is obvious that Gandhiji is doing all he can to make Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru acceptable to all concerned, including British statesmen, as his successor on the Congress gadi, as a stepping-stone to higher things. The Pandit has several qualifications which fit him pre-eminently for leadership. But he has also a few which are likely to prove serious impediments unless corrected in time. Chief of these is his proneness to hasty generalisations on important questions on which his information is patently inadequate. The other day he was reported to have said in the course of a speech that Indian States are relics of the past, implying that there was no use for them at present. What is not a relic of the past? Even the moth which flutters about the candle in a desperate effort to fulfil its ephemeral destiny, has a past. It is not that the Pandit himself is lacking in the historical feeling. In another speech a day or two earlier he spoke of the importance of cherishing such monuments as the Taj Mahal at Agra, which he visited before attending the Meerut Conference, as they were sources of inspiration to many generations. And this notwithstanding that the Taj was raised by a ruler who had never heard of democracy or responsible Government. The Pandit would make no exceptions. Even the best-governed Indian State, in his judgment, is, like the worst-governed, a 'relic of the past' and therefore fit only for the revolutionary's axe. In another speech at about the same time, he held up all who did not agree with his proposed Constituent Assembly as "enemies of freedom." No better proof can be found for the inference that the Pandit resorted to this trick of the hustings politician because he is unable to meet the cogent reasons against his idea which have been advanced, by those who oppose it. To call people with whom you differ enemies of freedom' is nothing but incitement to violence which in the same breath you profess to renounce. It is as easy for those who do not pin their faith to a Constituent Assembly to denounce the Pandit as an enemy of commonsense, if they could stoop to this type of controversy. His attack on the bureaucracy, in a speech at Agra, as being mainly responsible for the difficulties of Congress governments, is in direct contradiction to the warm testimoney borne to the loyal and willing co-operation of the Civil Service by Ministers themselves.

Mr. Jinnah's Thanksgiving :—As president of the Muslim League, Mr. M. A. Jinnah has addressed a statement to his co-religionists to observe Decembr 22 as Thanksgiving Day as a mark of relief that the Congress Governments have ceased to function. A resolution which he has drafted denounces the Congress as anti-Muslim and accuses the Hindus, "mostly Congressmen," of ill-treating the Muslims. We do not know whether Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru is still intending to carry on discussions with Mr. Jinnah for an understanding between the Congress and the Muslim. The fact that Congress Muslims have set their face against a "National Muslims" conference which was planned to set off the Muslim League propaganda, seems to indicate that they are still hoping for a miracle to take place. We cannot, we must confess, understand the position of the Congress Muslims. Have they a following in the country or have they been put up by the Congress? If, as they claim, they have a large following why do they hesitate to face the Muslim League? They seem at every crisis to play into the hands of their more energetic, if more narrow-minded, followers. The tenderness with which Congressmen approach the Muslim League forms a notable contrast to the animus with which Mr. Jinnah, sole spokesman for his party, invariably speaks of the Congress.

A Strange Appointment :—The announcement this week that a journalist of Australian birth and South African upbringing has been selected for the post of Director of Information in Bombay, came upon us with painful surprise. The Reformer is not as a rule interested in the game of jobs, but this has a special feature which raises a grave political issue. The two Dominions in which Mr. Claude Scott was born and had seen service, are notorious for their policy towards Indians. Australia pursuing a fanatical White Man's Land policy excludes Indians from its shores except as visitors. South Africa's treatment of Indians born in that country, descendants of those who built up the prosperity of Natal, is a crying scandal. The political status of India after the War is just engaging world-wide interest. Whatever it may be, it can not be surely such as to make India the happy hunting-ground of the Dominions which follow a policy of exclusion of the natives of this country. At present Governors are absolute rulers of the erstwhile Congress provinces but we expect that they would by their acts make the way smooth for the future. A selection such as this for a post which on every consideration would be best filled by an Indian, rubs Indian sentiment on the raw. The usual procedure of advertisement and reference to the Public Services Commission seems to have been dispensed with in this case.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, December 9, 1939.

A MYSORE INNOVATION.

The Nizam's Government in their scheme of constitutional reform have adopted representation by interests as the basis of their electoral system. It was, no doubt, originally intended that this should do away with the need for communal representation. But it has not done so. The communal principle has had to be superposed on the "interests" representation. The working of this novel scheme will be watched with interest. In Mysore, the Government have adopted another innovation. The new Constitution continues the existing two Chambers—the Representative Assembly and the Legislative Council—but the Legislature will not be a two Chamber one. The Representative Assembly is the older body, having been started soon after the Rendition in 1881. It was to be the medium through which the Government of the Maharaja could make their measures better known and understood by the people. Since then from time to time its functions have been enlarged but the direction in which the Assembly has grown, has been, in the words of the Reforms Committee's Report, that of the extension of the representative principle in the selection of its members. Although the Assembly had no legislative functions, it has exerted a growing influence on the legislative measures of the State. The Legislative Council was established in 1907, with legislation for its sole function. In British India admission for purposes of legislation preceded the admission of non-officials to consultation in matters of administration. The Executive Council with some additional members became the Legislative Council. In Mysore the popular element was given access to administrative affairs before it was admitted to a share in legislation. In British India the Legislative Council has been enlarged into a Parliamentary body consisting of two Chambers. In Mysore the two bodies under the Reform scheme will continue to be independent of and unconnected with each other except through the Executive Government. In the words of the Government Order :

> The two Houses do not correspond to the two chambers of a bicameral legislature. It may be said that the Representative Assembly embodies the oriental conception of government, while the Legislative Council represents its occidental conception. The two stand in a peculiar relationship to each other. They are not strictly co-ordinate but supplement each other's functions.

The oriental conception of sovereignty—Hindu and Muslim—did not include the power of legislation. The sovereign had merely to execute the decisions of the tribunals which traditionally enjoyed the right of interpreting the Shastras and the Koran. The occidental conception was much the same almost down to the French Revolution. The Common Law of England like the Hindu and Mohamedan law was outside the authority of the Sovereign. The right of legislation is really the concomitant of a democratic constitution. It is nevertheless subject to the veto of the Head of the State though the power in practice may not and cannot be exercised. In Great Britain as in Mysore the two Houses originated at different times and for distinct purposes, so much so that by convention the one House is always referred to as "another place" and not by name in the other House. But when two bodies exist side by side they must either co-operate or clash with each other sooner or later. The struggle between the two Houses in Britain has been bitter. Deadlocks have been averted only by the threat of the creation of new peers by use of the Royal prerogative. A hereditary chamber is always at a disadvantage in a conflict with a popular Chamber. In the new Mysore constitution the Representative Assembly will, as at present, be wholly elected, while the Legislative Council will for the first time have a majority of elected representative. Although legislation will be the function of the Council, the Representative Assembly will have a hand in shaping it. Government express their entire sympathy with the recommendation of the Committee that in the case of legislative, financial and adminstrative measures under contemplation, Government should as far as possible consult the Assembly and ascertain its views on such measures before taking a final decision. Government have further accepted the recommendation that in addition to a statement of the principles underlying a proposed Bill the Bill itself should be placed before the Assembly and its opinion ascertained This is further emphasised in the Proclamation of His Highness the Maharaja by the express direction that "the opinion expressed on any legislative measure by the Assembly will ordinarily be accepted by my Government," and in exceptional cases where public interests demand it, the Government, before introducing the Bill in the Legislative Council, will state the reasons for over-riding the Assembly. It is clear that the Government of Mysore regard and intend that the Representative Assembly should be the more important Chamber in the constitution. The Maharaja's Proclamation seems to differ somewhat from the Government Order from which we have quoted above, in its view of the relative position of the two Houses. His Highness observes that the two Houses which were originally independent in origin and functions "will now be brought into integral relationship with one another." The Parliamentary system of Government has been found unequal to prompt and efficient action in respect of the complex functions of a modern Government. In times of crisis it has become the practice now to resort to national governments and in extreme cases to government by decrees. It is only by trial and experience that India can arrive at a workable model. Experiments, sueh as those intiated by the States, will enable us to do this.

EUROPE AND THE COLONIAL QUESTION.

Three of the "Oxford Pamphlets on World Affairs"—No. 7. "Colonies and Raw Materials" by H. D. Henderson; No. 11. "The Dual Policy" by Sir Arthur Salter; and No. 12. "Encirclement" by Prof. J. B. Brierly—raise an issue which has a peculiar importance to all subject peoples in empire systems. In explaining British policy after Herr Hitler's march into Czecho-Slovakia, both Sir Arthur Salter and Prof. Brierly reduce the objections of the British Government to Germany's encroachments on the rights of other nations, to its opposition to allowing Hitler's Germany to dominate over people of another race or nation. No matter how much a German may detest Nazism, and no matter where he may be, he and his property, even immovable property in Central Europe, must be subject to Nazi laws, or may at any time have to submit to them. But the Nazi Government is not to be allowed to extend its authority over alien peoples. The connection between Britain's reaction to the Nazi march on Prague and Herr Hitler's demand for the return of German colonies is obvious. If the Anglo-French coalition could tolerate German domination of another European country, surely they could not withhold the old African colonies of the German Empire. The abandonment of appeasement dates accordingly from March 15, 1939. The new "dual policy" took its place. In registering his disapproval, the Foreign Secretary, Lord Halifax, declared publicly the resolve of his Government to resist aggression in the first place and, in the event of the nations of Europe showing proof of a genuine rejection of force in settling differences, of "reconstructing the international order on a broader and firmer foundation"—so far as the European is concerned. The Polish episode, thus, was only the "next act of aggression." There is convincing proof of this in the oft-reiterated "peace terms" which include the withdrawal of Nazi power from not only Poland but also Czechoslovakia—but significantly not from Austria.

As there was not any abandonment of force, the other alternative of strengthening the forces of resistance came into play. Prof. Brierly argues that "encirclement" which is a bad name for this policy, is not as black as the Germans paint it; it is defensive and not aggressive. He is rather naive in the argument he advances which is literally as follows:

> The vital difference between what you are doing and what we are doing is that our measures are defensive; we have every reason to fear that you, unless you are prevented, intend to impose your will on other independent nations by force, and we are, therefore, building up a "peace front" against you. You, on the other hand, have no reason to entertain any suspicions with regard to our intentions.

How does one carry out even one's peaceful intentions against an aggressor without "imposing one's will by force"? This has been for some time the disastrous search of the League powers. Sir Arthur Salter, on the other hand, plainly recognises that the fear of encirclement is real in German minds. This has subsequently been proved by the fact that a pact with the hated Bolsheviks was acceptable to the German masses as "a release from a closing-in circle." It is because of his appreciation of this factor that Sir Arthur sees the need for something more constructive than just sitting still and exuding good intentions. He looks forward to a United States of Europe and sees the need for working towards this end. His plea for a State paper on the plans for world reconstruction is a demand for a declaration of "war aims" made even before war was expected.

Sir Arthur is inclined to take the colonial problem rather lightly. Few in the colonies will share his over-optimistic view:—

> We have developed a colonial creed which was from an early stage one of paternal administration and soon developed into one which genuinely aims at its replacement by self-government. The Dominions have already become self-governing. India is far advanced upon the same path. Many colonies have reached differing stages of partial self-government, and the ultimate goal is aimed at for the rest...Until the recent decision to close the 'open door' we administered the colonies on the basic principle which was in the interests not only of the inhabitants but of the world as a whole.

Sir Arthur Salter is usually less of an apologist for colonialism than he is here. In an article on the Ottawa Conference immediately after the agreements were signed between different units of the Empire, he admitted that in the negotiations the colonies had received a "very subordinate consideration" and had been exploited by the self-governing Dominions. This meant nothing less than serving five masters instead of one. Now Sir Arthur talks of the interest of the world as a whole. It is an amusing fact that, as the colonial peoples grow in political consciousness, the imperialist nations are reciprocally awakening to the narrowness of nationalism and the world's right to share in the good things of life no matter where they may be found—outside Europe. Why should the world's interest come into the administration of backward peoples when it is completely ignored in the government of enlightened communities? The trustee analogy is often brought in. But who ever heard of a trustee pleading in addition to the interest of his charge, his own personal interest and that of the community in which they live? There is also a perhaps unconscious intention to persuade the "non-colonial" powers that colonies are a nuisance and a responsibility rather than assets to the ruling power. This idea is developed in Mr. Henderson's "Colonies and Raw Materials."

Mr. Henderson has restricted himself to the economic factors which arise in the relations of an empire country with its colonies. There is, therefore, no discussion of the political and administrative experience and employment which the ruling race enjoys and the opportunities it has for training its men. On the economic subject alone, Mr. Henderson arrives at the dismal conclusion that an imperial power spends more on, than it gains out of, its possessions and that industrial nations who have no possessions can well congratulate themselves on their freedom. He refers specially to sugar:

> So far are sugar colonies from being victims of imperialist exploitation that their whole standard of life is today dependent on the preferences that are given at the expense of the tax-payers or consuming publics of their metropolitan countries. Wretched by comparison is the plight of those tropical sugar-producing countries that are independent and do not form part of any preference-giving fiscal system.

He fails to realise in the first place, what he has mentioned himself in another connection, that "the control exercised by the British Government over the colonial empire has been of great benefit to British investors;" that, secondly, the preferences and the higher prices paid by the British for Empire products, go invariably, and in by far the largest proportion, to these investors and not to the inhabitants of the colonies; and that it is not in any way advantageous to any territory to have its economy—agriculture or industries—planned on the basis of an export market. If the test of modern imperialisms is to be how far they have prepared their colonies to stand by themselves, it must be admitted that all of them have failed miserably.

Dr. R. R. Kuczynski in "Living-Space and Population Problems," pamphlet No 8. in the series, has proved with devastating thoroughness that Germany cannot satisfy her desire for space even if she gets all her old colonies restored to her. He goes still further. He maintains that Germany does not need more space since she does not seek an outlet for her population but restricts emigration and recruits labour from her new territories. Dr. Kuczynski gives the example of the mandated British Cameroons, moreover, to show that for trade purposes there is no need for a country to have political dominion over another. There the old German plantations have been bought up by former German owners. In 1934, according to Lord Hailey, the larger part of the exports went to the United Kingdom, 98·8 per cent in fact. In 1937, so Dr. Kuczynski tells us, Germany's share in the exports of the Cameroons came to 47·7 per cent, greater than before the World War when it was a German Protectorate. What does this mean, assuming that the figures are correct? At first glance it would appear that the Cameroon Germans, like the pioneer settlers of America, had settled abroad under a more liberal Government. But as Dr. Kuczynski himself shows, there is a real bond between Germany and these colonists. It seems as though, under the Nazi regime, a very keen interest is shown in settling colonies in Africa. In the face of this, the objection that since Germany never settled large numbers of her people in her old colonies, therefore she was not likely to do so now, is untenable.

In what is decidedly the best of the series, "Economic Self-Sufficiency," Prof. A. G. B. Fisher discusses the problems of economic nationalism. His absolute freedom from cant and the complete national detachment he achieves, make his pamphlet an admirable study of the subject and an example which other writers might with advantage follow. Probably he owes this to the fact that he hails from New Zealand. He does not hesitate to point out the mistakes of both the democratic imperialisms and of the totalitarianisms. For example, he says:—

> It is difficult to draw any clear dividing line between the effects of conscious far-reaching plans of autarky, which we rightly condemn as damaging both to material welfare and international harmony, and the effects in every country of popular prejudice which, without any philosophical trimmings, takes the "common-sense" but in fact irrational view that we could usually manage our own affairs better if we were not so dependent upon the unpredictable vagaries of strange people in other parts of the world. It is a well-known British tradition to get ahead with practical policy without concerning ourselves much about its theoretical or philosophical foundations. This habit has its uses, but it may also have the dangerous effect of encouraging us to overlook the extent to which policies, which when formally expounded in other countries look dangerous, are at the same time being quietly practised by ourselves.

If there is to be a world conference and anything is to come out of it, it will be because of this spirit of self-criticism which still survives in the democracies, unhampered by governmental restrictions. Economic concessions, territorial adjustments and the other usual features of peace conferences can make little headway without such a feeling. The colonial system is the very antithesis of this, and its defence invariably lies on the ground that the sins of one country are more palatable than those of another because it is "my country." The war against Nazism is primarily a war to arrest the spread of colonialism into Europe. It cannot stop at that. What we in Asia and Africa demand is that colonialism be rejected throughout the world. And signs are not lacking to show that in that we have support of a considerable body of opinion in Europe itself.

WOMEN AND MARRIAGE IN INDIA.*

In the announcement printed on the flap of the dust cover, this book by Mr. P. Thomas is called an "objective sociological study," which is what it is not. An objective study does not take account of motives. It does not regard the object of study as anything but an object free from all subjective incidents. Mr. Thomas, however, is throughout obsessed with the villainy of the priestly class. He writes:

> Sanctity, everywhere, is an intimate friend of Mammon. That is why the European socialist who attacks orthodox theories of political economy without any idea of blaspheming finds himself face to face with the Pope and the Archbishop of Canterbury. That is why, too, the Indian reformer who advocates the economic independence of women finds himself accused of attacking the sanctity of the home and the hearth.

We suppose the European Socialist is no friend of Mammon. We claim to know something of the experience of Indian reformers, and we have not known of advocates of the economic independence of women being accused of attacking the sanctity of the home and the hearth. Then, again, the women of the working classes everywhere and in India as well, are economically independent and there is no need for reformers to advocate it for them. They are the majority of women. As for women of the professional classes, Mr. Thomas should know that the projects of reform of the law of women's property have in this country been generally sponsored and supported by lawyers and business men who otherwise are inclined to throw in their lot with conservative and orthodox elements. As a matter of fact, in default of legislation many parents and husbands make sure that part of their property goes to daughters and wives, and several modifications favouring this end have already been made in the law. We can only conclude from Mr. Thomas' omission to note the great changes that have been already made both by legislation, and by the decisions of High Courts and the Privy Council whieh have materially improved the position of women relating to women's property rights, that he is out of touch with recent developments. The picture of marriage in India as "a cruel form of organized inhumanity" can only be characterised as an outrage on facts. Under the guise of an objective sociological study, Mr. Thomas runs amuck against everything connected with religion, particularly Hinduism. Here is a sample:

> In India the religious idea ran riot even with greater wildness (than in Arabia). Our motherland produced thirty-three crores and three gods which, judging from the then population of India, must work up to at least three deities per head of human beings (Mr. Thomas can not keep out his pre-occupation with averages even here.) Our kings were beggars in comparison with the priests, so that freebooters like Mahommed of Ghazni were content to rob temples and leave kings alone.

The loot which the Ghaznivite carried away was not the property of the priests but that of the temple. Otherwise, he could have found it where he did. The passage is illustrative of the hatred for the priesthood which is the chief underlying theme of this "objective sociological study."

The same theme crops up in Mr. Thomas's account of the matriarchate in Malabar. He writes:

It is true that poor Nayar women pressed by economic necessity, form transient connections, especially with the Tamil Brahmins who come to Malabar for trading purposes. This should be regarded as a form of prostitution.

Mr. Thomas distorts facts. It is not poor Nayar women pressed by poverty that resorted (because the custom has practically died out where it has not been prohibited by legislation) to sambhandhams with Brahmins—not traders from the East Coast but Nambudri Brahmins of Malabar. It was the aristocratic families in which the custom was firmly rooted. As for the nature of the relation created by sambhandham, it is a libel to call it prostitution. Many highly cultured and respected Nayars, among them Dewan Bahadur C. Karunakara Menon, bitterly resented legislation for the registration of sambandhams as they maintained that they were as sacred and as solemnly binding as sacramental marriages.

The error of Mr. Thomas and those who think whith him, is to assume that the institution of marriage was created by law and can be altered, abrogated or penalised by law. This is directly due to their conception of marriage as a merely sexual relation. Marriage, however, it has been aptly observed, begins where the sexual relation ends. Mere sexual relationship does not constitute marriage. The existence of a permanent relation between the male and the female mating together for the protection of the offspring of the union, has been observed among birds and some animals. That is to say, the marriage relation has been evolved even among sub-humans as a biological necessity. It is not surprising and it is to be expected that among human beings a similar result should follow under similar circumstances. Even among patriarchal Hindus a woman refers to her husband as the father of her son. Hindu law is largely the embodiment of customs which prevailed at various times and different parts of the country. The priest in the Hindu system has nothing to do with the compilation or enforcement of the law.

The fact is Mr. Thomas is quite out of touch with and singularly ill-qualified to write objectively of the social system of India. If the passages quoted above do not show this, here is one which makes it plain as a pike-staff. Mr. Thomas complains that Indian children have "very little of the healthy wickedness of normal children, such as scaring dogs, hunting for birds and butterflies, and throwing stones at sanyasis and madmen." How did Mr. Thomas find his normal child?

THE FEDERAL COURT OF INDIA.

(By B. Banerji, Delhi.)

Provincial autonomy under the Constitution Act was inaugurated on the 1st of April 1937. This was the first step taken to break up a unitary government into federal fragments. While the executive government of the country was thus being shared between the provinces and the Centre, the establishment of the Federal Court a few months later meant a step in the opposite direction, that is towards the unification of the judiciary in the country. Not that there was not a Court over all the High Courts in India, exercising a general control over them all. There was the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council which entertained appeals from the different High Courts in British India and which laid down the law which they were bound to follow. But situated beyond 'the seven seas and the thirteen rivers' it was hardly anything but a name to the masses in the country. The Federal Court was the first all-India Court of Law on Indian soil. It marked the attainment of India's self-government in the judicial branch of the government. Its location in Delhi made Delhi once more the supreme fountain-head of justice which it had been all through its long and glorious history except for an interregnum.

The significance of the event has not been appreciated fully in this country. The reason has been two-fold. One reason has been the association of the world "Federal" with this the highest court in the land. The vocal section of public opinion had been so grievously dissatisfied with the federal scheme of the Government of India Act that everything "federal" appeared to be tainted in the popular imagination. I asked a prominent lawyer Congressman why he had not taken part in the inaugural ceremonies of the Federal Court as the Court had nothing to do with the federal scheme of Government. He replied that his action might have been misunderstood in the temper prevailing in political circles. Since then eminent Congress lawyers have got themselves enrolled as advocates of the Federal Court.

Another reason for the absence of enthusiastic interest in the Court is its extremely limited jurisdiction. In its original side it hears and decides disputes between the Federal units. Let there be no mistake about it that since the introduction of the Constitution Act there exists a Federation of India, "not indeed that greater Federation, whatever form it may ultimately assume, which the future holds in trust for us," to quote from Sir Maurice Gwyer's inaugural address, "but a federation of eleven provinces associated together in an organic union." In its appellate side it hears only those appeals in which the High Court concerned certifies that a substantial question of constitutional law is involved. Narrow and strait is the path that leads to this highest court of law in the land and very few in number are those who are privileged to tread it. Even during the short period of its existence many have turned away disappointed from its portals, for the judges, with all their implicit faith in the old maxim that it is the part of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction, have found it impossible to open them wide, their hands being tied by the stringent provisions of the statute.

It is not easy to understand why Parliament should have thought it wise to start the Federal Court in its career with such a limited jurisdiction. In the Round Table Conference eminent lawyers, like (the late) Sir Muhummad Shafi, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Sir Sultan Ahmad earnestly pleaded for the investment of the Central Court with full powers. Mahatma Gandhi, the sole representative of the Indian National Congress, expressed his opinion as follows: "I feel that the Federal Court should be a court of the widest jurisdiction possible and not decide cases only that arise from the administration of federal laws. Federal laws, of course, will be there, but it should have the amplest jurisdiction to try all the cases that may come from the four corners of India. Seeing that the Congress holds the view that this Federal Court or Supreme Court —whichever you call it—will occupy the position of the highest tribunal beyond which no man who is an inhabitant of India can go, its jurisdiction in my opinion will be limitless. It will have jurisdiction, so far as federal matters are concerned, to the extent that the princes are also willing; but I can not possibly imagine that we shall have two supreme courts—one in order to deal with merely federal law and another to deal with all the other matters that are not covered by the federal administration or the Federal Government. Because, at the present moment, I suppose, as things go the Federal Government will concern itself with the minimum of subjects, matters of the highest moment will be extra-federal. Who is to adjudicate upon these extra-federal matters if not this very Supreme Court? Therefore this Supreme Court or Federal Court will exercise double jurisdiction, if necessary treble jurisdiction. The greater the power that we give to this Federal Court, I think, the greater the confidence we shall be able to inspire in the world and also in the nation itself."

Anyone who is intimately connected with the Federal Court will testify to the wisdom of Mahatma Gandhi's last observation. The Federal Court does suffer in prestige and in the confidence of the people because of the very limited sphere in which it can make itself effective. It is no reply that the Supreme Court in the United States remained idle for three years before its first case came in. That was a hundred and fifty years ago. And moreover—and this is a significant difference—in America mutually exclusive States were, for the first time, owning allegiance to a central institution. Here, in India, we have always had centralised institutions, and a supreme court, which is unable to intervene in 99 per cent of justiciable questions, strikes us as an anomaly.

One thing, however, is crystal clear and that is the personal prestige enjoyed by the judges who compose the Federal Court. In the Round Table Conference, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru emphasised that character, integrity and independence counted for more in the judges than learning, ability and experience. The great jurist himself expressed satisfaction, in his speech on its inauguration, that the Court commanded the confidence of all. Since these words were spoken, eminent members of the Bar from all over the country have had occasion to appear before the Court and it can be said without fear of contradiction that the Bench of the Federal Court enjoys, in a unique measure, the confidence and the respect of the Bar of the entire country. There are few outside legal circles who can fully understand how exacting the test of the Bar is. What is more striking, however, is the implicit confidence of the lay-public in the sense of impartiality and fairness of the judges of the Federal Court. It is not given to every great judge to be a great popular figure. But the present Chief Justice of India, Sir Maurice Gwyer, seems to be an exception. In his first public utterance he expressed his hope that the Federal Court would "declare and interpret the law in no spirit of formal or barren legalism." Judgments of the Court, whether in disputes between Governments or whether in deciding questions brought before it by litigants too poor even to engage counsel, show that his hopes have not gone in vain. But this spirit of formal and barren legalism has no hold on him even outside the court-room. I know that when he accepted the Viceroy's offer to arbitrate on the Rajkot dispute, hoary heads, with an immense amount of legal learning in them, shook in doubt. Is this a task which the Chief Justice of India should consent to undertake? Is there any precedent of any Chief Justice of any Federal Court doing a similar thing? Such were the questions asked, but these were not the legalistic doubts that assailed Sir Maurice. If there was no precedent, he would create the precedent. He acted in the spirit of the following noble words of Mahatma Gandhi uttered during the debate on the question of the Federal Court in the Round Table Conference: "The Privy Council here is an ancie institution, and an institution which justly comman very great regard and respect; but, in spite of a the respect that I have for the Privy Council, cannot bring myself to believe that we will n be able to have a Privy Council of our own whi will command universal esteem..... Our beginnin may be very small, but if we have strong, true an honest hearts to give decisions, it does not matte in the slightest degree that we have not got th legal traditions which the Judges in England claim and very properly boast of before the whole world." When Dr. Rajendra Prasad, the President of the Indian National Congress, suggested that Sir Maurice Gwyer should adjudicate on the Muslim grievances in the Congress Provinces, he expressed the country's tribute to the broadmindedness of the eminent head of the judiciary in India.

When the feeling in the country is as Mahatma Gandhi authoritatively expressed it and when we have got a Bench on the Federal Court which commands universal esteem, it is an unjustifiabl waste of national money to keep the judges compul sorily idle for the major portion of the year. "The Privy Council's portals," said Mahatmaji, "if it is really to give relief to the poor people in matters of the highest importance, should be open to the poorest people in the land and I think it is impossible if the Privy Council (in England) is to decide our fate in the matters of greatest importance." The Constitution Act does provide for the enlargement of the appellate powers of the Federal Court though they are not quite so wide as was demanded by the majority of the delegates to the Round Table Conference. For instance, regular appeals in criminal cases do not lie to the Federal Court at all under the Constitution Act. But there is an over-whelming case for investing the Court with the powers that the Act provides for, but which provision has not yet been put into force.

I do not propose to examine in detail all the objections that are made against the extension of the Court's appellate powers. The real and the main obstacle seems to be the opposition of the vested interests in London. On an average one hundred appeals go from India to the Privy Council in a year and Mahatmaji gave his opinion that each appeal on an average cost £ 2,000. Should this be allowed to continue, if there is help for it?

Now that the Federation of British India and the Indian States has receded to the background, there is all the less likelihood of the Court's time being fully occupied with, what I may for the sake of convenience describe as, the Federal cases. With communications becoming more and more difficult with the progress of the war, it is becoming increasingly more difficult for the litigants to take their cases to the Privy Council in London. Apart from the very natural aspiration of the people to be judicially self-sufficient, there are weighty reasons which by themselves call for and justify the enlargement of the appellate powers of the Federal Court as provided for in the Constitution Act.

THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

I had formulated in The Indian Social Reformer a series of questions on the Constituent Assembly which have got to be answered before any Government in power could consider it to be an adequate and satisfactory method. Some of these questions have since been answered by Mr. Rajagopalacharya. But many questions have not been answered, and these are the more important ones. No one has stated in so many words that the subjects of the States will not be represented in this Assembly, but the inference to be drawn from the various pronouncements appears to be that; and it is a fatal omission. The British Indian people have no manner of right, political or moral, to frame a Constitution which would be binding on the people of the States through an Assembly in which their representatives are not members. The other questions left out are equally important—viz., the manner of election, the number of delegates, and the actual method by which minorities would be satisfied—do they vote separately on every question affecting their interests; who decides what are such questions; and are such decisions to conclude the matter? If a Working Committee is to do the spade work how is that Committee to be constituted so as to satisfy minorities?

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Even the Hindu which is a Congress paper, considers that Gandhiji has not adequately appreciated the magnitude of the difficulties inherent in the notion. The Indian Social Reformer in its issue of the 25th November, appears to have arrived at the conclusions which follow from my articles and questionnaire in that paper. The conclusion is that a Constituent Assembly which would be acceptable to all interests is difficult and that the same result could be achieved by agreement between leaders. The object of this article, however, is to get a 'move on.' Although Gandhiji's knowledge of constitutional details is not profound, his prestige is immense and he has the formidable weapon of civil disobedience. Hence it seems to me that he might be asked to put up a really detailed scheme for consideration. Such a scheme must obviously have the previous consent of the Moslem League and other important minorities and of representatives of the subjects of the States. British interests are justiciable interests and could be settled fairly and equitably by an impartial tribunal like the Chief Justice of the Federal Court. If Paramountcy is allowed to become an Indian concern as suggested already, and if the Princes are told that autocracy has to cease, and that the smaller States must combine into larger units, the question of the status of the Princes in Federal India although complex, is capable of settlement. Any justiciable questions such as Customs might be referred to the above impartial tribunal. The only remaining problem is that of Defence, which is a matter for settlement by mutual agreement.

Thus, instead of condemning a constituent Assembly outright, it seems to be wiser to agree to the idea in principle, provided the manner of overcoming the inherent difficulties is also suggested by those who have made the proposal.

A gesture of this kind will at once take the wind out of the sails of England's enemies and critics, and will also make it a function of the Congress which is admittedly the most important political organisation, to come to terms with other parties and interests. Such a course will not in the slightest degree affect any vital interest of Great Britain.

As the most powerful person in India has become an advocate of the Constituent Assembly, I am unable to think of any other solution. What the result would be, I can guess—but my point is that it is not a difficult matter to put on his mettle or defence the great Saint and politician of India.

It would probably be sufficient, as a matter of practical politics to ask Gandhiji and Mr. Jinnah whether they could agree concerning the constitution and method of functioning of the proposed Assembly and to propose a time-limit for such agreement. In all probability this very first hurdle will bring down this favourite of the Congress. If that should be the case, there are other alternatives mentioned below, which are open to Government. After making it quite clear that Dominion Status would be established, and steps taken thereto as soon as there is agreement between Hindus and Moslems, the Congress might be given the option of two alternatives,—viz., to agree to Coalition governments in all the Provinces and a Coalition Cabinet at the Centre—the two ideas are constitutionally related the one to the other; or to resume office as Congress governments but after agreeing to co-operate in the prosecution of the war, and agreeing also to serve, along with members of other parties and representatives of the Princes in a War Cabinet at the Centre; this Cabinet being responsible for all war measures and for Defence. Such a Cabinet could also sit together for framing a Dominion constitution for India.

Should Gandhiji fail to come to an agreement with Mr. Jinnah concerning the Constituent Assembly and should the Congress decline to agree to either of the other two alternatives, all reasonable men in India would, it is hoped, come to the conclusion that the Congress is determined to be a totalitarian party in India. And perhaps, in several of the Congress provinces, it might be possible after re-election, to establish coalition governments commanding a stable majority—provided that leaders are forthcoming to explain clearly to the electors that failure to adopt a reasonable and commonsense attitude and to vote for candidates who wish to co-operate in winning the war, would show up Indian voters as not possessing the mental discipline which is necessary for Democracy. It is easy to follow Hitler or Stalin or Gandhiji blindly. It is much more difficult to cultivate self-discipline and co-operation of equally free and self-respecting minds.

The Congress Ministries, although they have been eminently successful, have not exhibited the real democratic spirit in the matter of tolerance for other views, or respect for the leaders of the opposition. In spite of assertions to the contrary, it is a moot point whether Congress leaders are really democratically minded. The essence of that mind is to ascribe to the other fellow an equal capacity for political thinking and political action as for oneself. I cannot conceive of Abraham Lincoln, John Bright, W. E. Gladstone, or even Lloyd George and Ramsay MacDonald, giving utterance to the following sentiment, "The Congress becomes a non-violent army in war-time In this capacity it has no voting power. Its will is expressed by the General whoever he may be. Every unit has to tender him willing obedience in thought, word and deed. Yes, even in thought since the fight is non-violent." These words are apt for Hitler and Stalin if violent is substituted for non-violent. It is the sum and substance of the totalitarian ideology. Satyagraha is difficult to understand in spite of many explanations, but if it included obedience in thought to any single person it stands self-condemned.

These observations are only of the nature of feelers towards Peace. Other and better suggestions could always be made by competent persons; but I hope it has been shown that it is possible to get a move on without in any manner infringing the domain of righteousness.

Congress leaders as practical men ought to realize that after England wins the war without support from them, and without co-operation in the manner indicated above or in any other manner, their prestige and leverage for bargaining with the British would be very greatly lessened.

EDUCATION IN HYDERABAD.

(By A. Padmanabha Iyer, Trivandrum).

The Director of Public Instruction in the Nizam's Dominions has just released a report on the working of his Department during the year 1347 F (1937-38 A. D.), an elaborate document dealing with all branches. He has started a new line by taking up such subjects as the education of the deaf, the dumb and the blind, the children of the nomadic hill tribes and the depressed classes and also for the eradication of malnutrition among school children.

The total number of schools of all kinds during the year was 5,131 as against 4,768 in the previous year, and the number of scholars was 3,81,018 as against 3,67,768. In addition to these there were 889 private schools with 24,777 pupils, as against 872 schools and 24,337 scholars in the preceding year. It will be thus seen that there were on the whole 6,028 schools with 4,05,795 pupils as against 5,640 schools and 3,92,605 scholars in the previous year. In the Dominions there is a serious obstacle in the way of educational progress. There is a large area of 25,000 square miles of territory, or nearly one-third of the total area of the State, under the jurisdiction of Jagirs, Samasthanams and Paighas. This is a backward tract of country where no serious efforts are made to spread education. The serious nature of the problem is best understood when it is stated that out of 5,132 schools only 108 schools are situated in this area which has a population of three millions or more than one-fifth of the entire population of the State. In other words, while in those parts of the Dominions for which the Department is directly responsible as far as education is concerned there is one school for every 17 square miles, the areas covered by jaghirs, Samasthanams and paighas have one school for every 231 square miles. When, therefore, one takes into account the educacional condition of Hyderabad, this drag on the State Department of Education has to be considered. It is all the more surprising when one recognises the fact that this area is inhabited by landed magnates who ought to be able to find the money necessary for bringing about a higher percentage of literacy. The percentage of scholars under instruction to the population of school-going age was 18·7, as against 18·1 in 1346 F, that of boys being 31·6 and that of girls 5·3.

The State has a population of two lakhs of wandering hill tribes among whom literacy is nil. As the children belonging to these classes move about from place to place with their parents who do not settle down permanently anywhere, the hope of bringing them under the influence of ordinary schools has to be given up. At the same time the Department has taken measures to educate them. Inspectors have been asked to collect information and report on the types of these wandering tribes, their mode of living, their means of livelihood, etc, with a view, if possible, to provide special facilities for the children of these classes. After obtaining the necessary information, the Department proposes to prepare a scheme for providing either a special type of school or a band of itinerant teachers for the education of children belonging to these nomadic tribes.

The number of children in the primary section of the Department has increased to such an extent as to necessitate the separation of this section from High Schools so as afford better control and supervision. In pursuance of the policy laid down by Government, the Department has been endeavouring to expand primary education as far as possible, while, in the realm of secondary education, it has been directing its efforts towards improving the existing secondary schools.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, t is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Europe, the Key Continent :—In his reply in the House of Commons to Mr. Attlee who desired that the benefits gained from the war should be extended to Asia and Africa as well as to Europe, and in his broadcast on Sunday last, the Prime Minister, maintained that peace in Europe was the first and primary object of the War. The extension of the scope of the war as desired by the Leader of the Opposition to Asia and Africa, would entail the Allies taking upon themselves the obligation to restore the independence of Ethiopia and the expulsion of Japan from China. But the Prime Minister did not, of course, urge these practical difficulties against Mr. Attlee's suggestion. And there is India. He argued that Europe was the key continent and the establishment of stable conditions in Europe was, therefore, their immediate purpose. Would the establishment or rather re-establishment of the Concert of Europe be any more beneficial to the rest of the world or to Europe itself than it was during the one hundred years prior to the last War? We are afraid that Mr. Chamberlain is in for a great disillusionment. In the last analysis the causes of the present war are to be traced to the rivalry of the European nations in Asia and Africa. Europe as a whole is not self-sufficient. It has to draw its sustenance from the two great continents and she must do so by trade or coercion. All through the last century and still to no small extent, Europe gets her requirements through coercion, open and veiled. She is able to do so because up to now she has the practical monopoly of the manufacture, and skill in the use, of the weapons of destruction—bombing planes, submarines, poison gas. Japan has caught up with her and others will do so in time. To the non-European onlooker the deepest interest of the present European conflict lies in the way in which the barriers between races and continents are being broken down. General Franco had Moorish troops to help him to crush the Spanish Republicans. France has a large number of Algerian and other African soldiers fighting on the Western Front against another White race. Indian troops are in Egypt and in the last war they were the first to rush to the defence of Paris. What is more, Soviet Russia is extending her arms on one side to Finland and on the other to Central Asia and the Pacific, and doing so absolutely without any distinction of race, colour or creed. Through war and bloodshed, God's great purpose, the unification of the human race, is being fulfilled against man's obstinacy. The Federation of the World which the Poet foresaw as the sequel to "the nations' aerial navies grappling in the central blue," is being earnestly discussed on a hundred platforms and in a score of books. The British Prime Minister, however, prefers not to look beyond his nose. There is a certain simplicity, not to say naivete, in his plan to make a better world by expelling the bullying mentality out of Europe.

Britain and Imperialism :—In his famous speech on the Congress demand in the House of Commons, Sir Samuel Hoare made the startling but welcome declaration that the Conservative Party had abandoned Imperialism long ago. A few days later, Mr. Malcolm MacDonald in a broadcast to the Colonies repeated the assurance with the saving clause, "if we ever had it." Both these Ministers, it is clear, had a definite idea of what Imperialism is when they repudiated it. The Prime Minister this week professed that he did not know what Imperialism was. Mr. Neville Chamberlain proceeded tentatively to supply a definition. If, he said, > Imperialism means the assertion of racial superiority, if it means the suppression of political and economic freedom of other peoples, if it means the exploitation of resources by other countries for the benefit of an Imperialist country, then I say that those are not the characteristics of this country (cheers), but they are the characteristics of the present administration in Germany.

Mr. Chamberlain's definition is right so far as it goes. But it is not exhaustive. Anyhow everybody understands what Imperialism means except Mr. Chamberlain, and he has less reason than others for his ignorance because he began his distinguished career in Jamaica or some other West Indian colony which is neither geographically nor ethnically a part of Great Britain. But there is a certain force in his contention, if that was what he meant, that Imperialism is a German and not a British product. Britain, however, borrowed it from Germany. When on his return from the Berlin Congress, Lord Beaconsfield proposed to embellish the British Crown by adding to it the Imperial title in order to keep it on a level with the dignity of the then recently created German Emperor, Mr. Gladstone vehemently protested against the change as being alien and repugnant to the genius and traditions of the British people. In passing, is it Mr. Chamberlain's intention to drop the Imperial title which applies only to India and not to the Dominions nor even to the Colonies? Perhaps, Mr. Chamberlain has heard of a poet-novelist named Rudyard Kipling and his famous song, about "The White Man's Burden." Mr. Chamberlain's profession of ignorance of what Imperialism was and his repudiation of it as having any concern with Great Britain, was received with applause by the House of Commons. Let us hope that this German product will be completely cast out of the British system into which it was imported about sixty years ago against the protest of the greatest English statesman of the Victorian era.

The Sinking of the "Rawalpindi":—The appointment of Mr. Winston Churchill to the Admiralty was expected to produce great results. He has been in office for more than three months and still in the operations on the seas the Germans have not been deprived of all initiative. The latest tragedy is the sinking of the "Rawalpindi," a converted passenger ship engaged in patrol work in the Arctic Ocean to prevent contraband goods from being carried to enemy ports. Except for 30, the whole crew of 300 went down with the ship. The "Rawalpindi" was attacked by two German warships one of which was the pocket battleship "Deutschland" which was heard of not long ago as prowling one time near the South American and at another near the South African coast. The behaviour of the Rawalpindi may be applauded as heroic or criticised as fool-hardy according to individual proclivities. She sighted the "Deutschland" six miles away and knew at once that she was at a disadvantage as the German guns had a longer range than her own. Instead, however, of trying to increase the distance between herself and the enemy ship, the "Rawalpindi" deliberately moved closer so as to get the latter within range of her own guns. While the fight was fierce, another German ship appeared on the scene and opened fire on the "Rawalpindi." Caught between the two fires, there was no hope now. The U-boat menace has been controlled but the Germans have started sowing what are called "magnetic mines" which are attracted towards ships near neutral coasts. The sinking of the "Rawalpindi" by this daring raider shows that the First Lord of the Admiralty has not still full control of the situation, or that he is no longer the dynamic personality that he was reputed to be.

Sidelights on Burma:—Interesting sidelights on conditions in Burma were thrown in a paper read by Mr. Burton Leach and the discussion which followed thereon at the East India Association in London last June. Mr. Burton Leach is a former Chief Secretary to the Government of Burma who on retirement became a member of the Rangoon non-official European community and one of their principal spokesmen. His paper was headed "Autonomy on trial in Burma," to which Sir Geoffrey Winterbotham right took exception. Autonomy might have collapsed in Burma as some of the other speakers, and the facts, collected in Mr. Leach's paper, suggested But there was nothing else to take its place. Sir Geoffrey, who is a Bombay man, was inspired by the inveterate Bombay optimism to regard the troubles described by the lecturer as "growing pains." He added, "We ought to be careful to avoid saying or doing anything which might give the impression to our Burmese friends that we are sabre-rattling." The lecturer, and practically all the speakers, agreed that the "political monk" was the most serious factor in Burma's politics. Two Ministers had expressly stated that their conduct in accepting and resigning office was due to clerical pressure. Sir Id. Lloyd asserted that each political party in Burma had an ecclesiastical caucus behind it to dictate its platform and methods. The Burman was a happy-go-lucky individual, that is to say he did not, as his European critics did, regard money-making as the be-all and end-all of life. One of the speakers had the candour to observe that in the same conditions which obtained in Burma, a fertile soil and a slow-going population Englishmen would not have been more money minded than the Burmans. Another speaker contrasted the high birthrate in India with the low one in Burma. Mr. Abraham asked if the lecturer could explain the difference between over-populated India and comfortably populated Burma. Mr. Leach pleaded that he could not. There was a difference of opinion among the speakers as to whether Burmans were capable of working democratic institutions. While some, including the lecturer, were inclined to think that they were not, Mr. Abraham advanced the paradox that this was because Burma was the most democratic, in the sense of equalitarian, country in the world. There were no castes as in India and no classes as in England. With comparatively few exceptions, all Burmans had much the same level of education, wealth and standard of living. There was, therefore, no cleavage between the "haves" and the "have nots," Mr. Abraham added, which would normally form the basis of the Party system. Parliamentary democracy can not work where here is social equality!

Moscow Over Finland:—In her aggression on Finland, Soviet Russia has brought into play every political weapon she could lay hold of drawing from the Nazis, the Fascists and in parody, Mr. Chamberlain. The Soviet press initiated last week a campaign of attack on the heads of the Finnish State which, if it was more restrained than the language used by Nazi propagandists in the past, was infinitely more deadly in so far as it poured ridicule on the present Finnish leaders. One of the charges against the Finnish Premier was that he was playing the buffoon. At the same time M. Molotov uttered a last word on the night of November 29, in which, picking the best plums of Mr. Chamberlain's war speeches, he blandly announced that he had no quarrel with the Finnish people but that it was utterly beyond Russian endurance to bear with the present Government and that any military action Russia might be forced into would be with a view to setting up a better Government in Finland with which peace terms could be settled to the advantage of both peoples. As an inducement he held out the promise that with a friendly Finnish Government, Russia was prepared to go more than half-way; Russia, he asserted, was even prepared to unite the Finns in Russian territory with their "blood-brothers" in Finland in an independent national State. In the face of the existing Government's obstinacy, M. Molotov regretted that Moscow had to break off all diplomatic relations with her small neighbour. Eight hours after the speech, on Thursday morning at eight, Russian troops marched against Finland while her air force raided Helsinski and other towns, and the Soviet navy prepared for action. Following the historic Fascist example of Wal-Wal, the Soviet official agency justified the invasion on the ground of three frontier incidents, at 2 a. m., 3 a. m., and 4 a. m. on Thursday when Soviet outposts where "attacked" by Finnish troops. Finland reacted to the first attacks with a strengthened determination to resist, the Parliament expressing by a unanimous vote its complete confidence in the Cabinet and the Government resolving to function until the destruction of its members in Helsinski itself. A second air raid, however, brought about a changed attitude in the Cabinet. As we go to press, news comes through that the Cabinet has resigned in the hope that a new Government will be able to negotiate with Finland's powerful neighbour. As one reads this one remembers that not so long ago Dr. Schuschnigg of Austria gave way to Herr Hitler on the understanding that a pro-Nazi Government in Vienna could alone preserve an independent Austria; that to preserve Czechoslovak independence Dr. Benes had made way for Dr. Hachha. One remembers too that both sacrifices were in vain. It remains to be seen how far exactly the Soviet State will follow in the footsteps of its Nazi preceptor.

Communist-Imperialism :– The attitude of Soviet Russia must be perplexing to a good many people, particularly to those who had concluded from the abandonment of "world revolution" that the Russian Government wanted nothing so much as to live peacefully with its neighbours. There must be a certain ironic satisfaction, however, to the surviving Trotskyites in contemplating this further confirmation of Trotsky's suspicion that M. Stalin disguises an incapacity for original thought by appropriating the schemes of his more brilliant colleagues after first destroying them. But the new technique is different from anything which Trotsky conceived and Herr Hitler has put into operation so successfully. That was to intervene in the affairs of a foreign country on behalf of an ideological, racial or national minority and often on the "invitation" of such a minority. The Stalin method goes further: It is intervention not so much on behalf of, as for the good of, the people of a foreign country who are not particularly willing to have such intervention. In the case of Poland there was at least the semblance of freeing the workers from economic exploitation. Finland, however, shares with other Scandinavian countries a high economic standard and has no need for Moscow help in adjusting inequalities. Here the naked imperialism of the present Soviet policy is clearly revealed, the suggestion that Moscow knows better and has more closely at heart the good of the Finnish people than her own leaders. We know that indiscriminate admirers of the Soviet State will have many extenuating circumstances to set forth. That it is not possible for Soviet Russia, nor is it right on our part to expect, her to maintain a higher international standard than her capitalist neighbours; that had the other countries not excommunicated the Soviet State, there would have been no need now for Russia to protect herself against possible aggression; and that Finland by her very suspicions in the past has been led into anti-Soviet policies. We are not concerned with these nor with the unrelenting critics of the Russian regime who always saw the worst even when it was not there. They both after all have some consolation in the thought that Russia is no better or worse than other capitalist States. It is those who had expected Russia to advance new standards in international relations and who now see the abandonment in this part of the world of all claims to idealism, whose loss is really great. And there is more than the mere fact of territorial accessions. Even if Russia now withdraws, after the Finnish gesture, from her compaign, she cannot get over the fact that her Government sanctioned a punitive expedition against the Finnish people. Italy stands on her admission for the restoration of Imperial Rome. Nazi Germany looks solely to setting up the German people as supreme on earth, Herr Hitler having repeatedly repudiated any responsibility to non-German races. But it is a peculiarly tragic spectacle to see the Soviet State, which declares its undying interest in the workers of the world, launching air raids on the capital of another State because it cannot have its own way with it. If Soviet Russia had really the Finnish people at heart, military action would never have been resorted to, much less on the flimsiest of pretexts. The Finnish Cabinet, on the other hand, would seem to have subordinated their first inclination to resist aggression, to their natural anxiety to avert a calamity from Finnish homes.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, December 2, 1939.

BRITISH ADMINISTRATION IN INDIA.

One of the ablest and most devoted men who have served India was Sir William Meyer. He was Finance Member of the Government of India when the last war broke out and his strenuous resistance to the pressure brought to bear on the Government of India for war contributions by his co-religionist, the late Mr. Edwin Montagu, then Secretary of State for India, also a warm friend of India in his own way, was well-known. He was promoted first High Commissioner for India in London and died a tragic death through being run over by a heavy vehicle. In his last Will he bequeathed to the University of Madras in which he took a deep interest since his early service in that Presidency, an endowment of a lectureship on problems of Indian administration. The Sir William Meyer Lectures for 1936-37 were delivered by Professor M. Rutnaswami. They have been published in a single volume* under the caption, "Some Influences that made the British Administrative System in India." The lectures reveal a vast amount of research into neglected sources and much reflection on their significance. No tribute will be too high to pay to the conscientious and accurate studies which are embodied in this volume. The title is rather forbidding but we suspect that Professor Rutnaswami purposely refrained from giving a more catching title to his work as he might have easily done. The lectures were meant for post-graduate students who are themselves engaged in similar research and a sensational title would have repelled rather attracted them to the book. The six lectures relate to the Commercial Origin of the Administration, the Army in relation to the Administration, Land Revenue as Maker of the Administration, the Hold of the Frontier, the State made by the Administration, and Social and Political Ideas forged by the Administration. There is finally an Epilogue in which Professor Rutnaswami attempts a dip into the future. The origin of the East India Company and of the British rule in this country as commercial concerns, are familiar to every school-boy. Professor Rutnaswami's opinion that "the commercial motive influenced the course of English policy and administration from the beginning till almost the end," however, is open to question. By "the end," of course, he means the end of the East India Company. Surely long before 1858, the Company's Government had forgotten its commercial origin and was in a fair way to establish itself as a national government. Elphinstone, Munro and Malcolm never thought of themselves as commercial agents. On the contrary, these men were the strongest protagonists of fostering Indian trade and industry and making India self-sufficient in matters of administration. The fundamental error of Mr. Rutnaswami's treatment of British rule is that he fails to see that, although it began as a foreign and commercial enterprise, it had, at the earliest moment possible after the period of consolidation, begun to link up with Indian life. "The plan I have proposed" wrote Elphinstone of his scheme based on the Panchayats, "has many obvious and palpable defects, and many more will no doubt appear when its operations are fully observed. It has this advantage, that it leaves unimpaired the institutions, the opinions and the feelings that have hitherto kept the community together; and that, as its fault is meddling too little, it may be gradually remedied by interfering when urgently required." Elphinstone felt, writes Forrest, that the object of the conquerors ought not to be to destroy the native system, but to take measures to remove the abuses and revive its energy. Elphinstone and the school of statesmen who laid the foundations of the Indian Empire, realised that political institutions and social usages which had lasted for centuries could not be entirely devoid of merit. Their great endeavour was, in the words of Elphinstone, "to show the people that they are to expect no change but in the better administration of their former laws." To those of us who insist that the educational system was primarily intended to produce clerks, may be commended Elphinstone's insistence on the obligation of the rulers "to raise the natives by education and public trust to a level with their present rulers." The influence of this school which may be aptly called that of Indian nationalism, continued to dominate the administration up to the last days of the Company. Macaulay himself belonged to the school. Writing soon after the transfer of the Government from the Company to the Crown, Sir Henry Maine said that the theory has always been that India is ruled according to her own ideas. In view of these authoritative declarations it is startling to read Professor Rutnaswani's assertion that the British Indian administrator had nothing to guide him and had to evolve principles from his own inner consciousness as it reacted to the circumstances around him. The Professor observes :—

> Cut off by physical and intellectual distance from the main currents of European thought, with noses hold to the grind-stone of the most detailed and complicated administration of the world, called upon to the administration of an alien people whose ideas and constitutional modes were not his own, it was no wonder that the English administrator in India has had to rely on Indian facts and circumstances to teach him the ideas that were necessary to supply the motive power of the administrative machinery that he had set up in India.

Professor Rutnawsami forgets that the Indian administration was taken up as a going concern by the British. Lord Hailey in a recent address in London on India said that the British found in India institutions similar to those to which they were accustomed in their own land. The men who built up the Empire when they were "cut off by physical and intellectual distance from Europe," did not seek for any theories to import from abroad. They found that the best guidance they could have was from the ideas and institutions of the country itself. The administrator who starts with abstract theories which have no relation to local conditions, is sure to share the fate of King Amanullah of Afghanistan. When the Indian administrator ceased to be cut off by physical and intellectual distance from Europe, British rule changed its character and became an economic imperialism. Against the last act of the transition, the whole Government of India protested and the Viceroy, Lord Northbrook, resigned. But this is another story.

WORLD POLITICS.

A welcome innovation in political publications is the 3d. series started by the Oxford University Press under the general title, "Oxford Pamphlets on World Affairs." The first thirteen of these have been released to the public and the range of subject is from politics to socio-economic questions. The treatment has been, as far as it is possible with such controversial subjects as the Treaty of Versailles and the future of Civilisation, general and on the whole optimistic. In the first of the series Sir Alfred Zimmern discusses "The Prospects of Civilization." He deplores the general pessimism of the day and seeks a readjustment of mental attitudes. He divides the problems of international relations into three groups, the moral, the political and the economic. In the first field he argues that the advance in communications and the multiplication of contacts has made it more difficult to bring moral standards to bear on men and women than under the older conditions; that the recognition of a "Christian" standard in the international sphere was more general even twenty years ago and there was some shame in openly transgressing it; and that in politics, as in medicine, there is an etiquette by which the moral life of the individual is adjusted to politics. All these statements are but part of the reality. If the advance of communications has made the application of moral standards difficult, it has also thrown the white light of publicity on the acts of rulers. It is not for nothing that press and radio scream forth denials and charges and counter-charges almost every day; the moral judgment of the world is today in a stronger position to express itself. If the Christian standard is not so generally accepted today, there is, to balance this, the diminution in numbers and importance in the present War of the priest who blessed his country's soldiers as they went out to fight. Medical etiquette is not the unmixed good Sir Alfred would have us think it is. In America and in Britain there are already experiments in medical service which go beyond the rules of etiquette and are looked down upon by orthodox medical practitioners. Business morality is a term which has grown to be as opprobrious as the politician's honesty. Though one does not agree with Sir Alfred's arguments, one must accept his conclusion that the gap between promise and performance must be closed and every effort must be directed to this end. The next aspect, the economic, is one of adjustment. Sir Alfred visualises the problem as one of primitive man in the modern world. Here the question as he sees it is, what is the smallest change that is necessary for the average man to reap the benefits of the present age. And then he ends on the political problem, the immediate one of settling with Germany. Sir Alfred wrote in June and he seems to have foreseen the inevitability of this war. "Then," he says, "the process of rational and neighbourly discussion can be resumed between the peoples of Europe, great and small." Sir Alfred is rather tired of German aggressiveness which in the past eighty years has already waged four European wars—has Britain a poorer record?—and wishes to settle this "chronic condition." From the phrase he uses "political immaturity," one is led to infer that the next treaty in his opinion will succeed only if the German people pass through a period of political education under the Anglo-French political experts. This is a somewhat larger objective than Mr. Chamberlain's modest one to overthrow Hitlerism; it is in fact something approaching very near Hitlerism itself. We cannot see in what other way Europe can ensure that Germany will be administered in a manner contrary to her traditions.

In pamphlet No. 6 on "The Fourteen Points and the Treaty of Versailles," Mr. G. M. Gathorne Hardy considers the first attempt to "educate" Germany politically. Mr. Gathorne-Hardy's contention that the Treaty of Versailles is not as black as it is painted, is based not on the argument that the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk imposed by Germany on Russia was worse but on the thesis that it did not differ materially from the Fourteen Points of Wilson. In proving this, the author has adopted the doubtful expedient of bringing down the Fourteen Points to the level of the Versailles Treaty. On some of the Points, Mr. Gathorne-Hardy claims that President Wilson himself modified his earlier idealism on grounds of impracticability, thereby granting absolution to the Allies. It is poor consolation to victims of the Treaty to know that the originator of the idea of a better peace himself approved of certain departures from his basic demands. At the same time the writer confers a certain rigidity on the Versailles Treaty by absolving it from the sins of the many departures from its terms which its framers tolerated. In other words, the framers of the Versailles Treaty brought about the de-idealisation of the Fourteen Points before the Treaty and after it they went on to ignore the inconvenient sections of the Treaty. The pamphlet has a value for its clarification of ideas on the subject, provided the reader is careful to draw the distinction that the arguments advanced are not in justification of the consequences of that peace-making.

* * * *

From Sir Alfred Zimmern's survey it is an easy transition to Mr. H. V. Hodson's "The British Empire," the second in the series. Mr. Hodson's view of the Empire is a rosy one. Mr. Hodson hurries the India skeleton back into the cupboard after a brief mention that there is autonomy in the provinces. There is a remark on race which is not altogether justified by facts. Mr. Hodson after saying that the United Kingdom does not discriminate on grounds of race or colour in regard to the entry of British subjects, and that the Dominions do in some cases prohibit non-white peoples (and in others treat them brutally), points out that the race problem will grow more acute as the non-white races rise to self-governing status and expresses his opinion that their existence within the British Empire is a help to a solution of the race problem. Mr. Hodson specially mentions India. It is possible he has reasons for holding this opinion. But it has been mentioned more than once by Indians in South Africa, for example, that the Japanese are able to get better treatment out of the Union Government than Indian fellow-subjects of the British Empire. Mr. Hodson is on surer ground when he writes :

> The British Empire is far from perfect. It has come into being through historical events not all of which were creditable. The policies of its members in economic, political, racial, and colonial affairs are doubtless often open to criticism—criticism which they are constantly undergoing from its own citizens, individually or by way of their press, parliaments, and institutions. Through all its affairs blows the keen and cleansing wind of democracy, based on freedom of speech, of the press, and of association. These are the fundamentals of the British Empire way of life. If they were to go it would not matter that the Empire was physically strong or economically prosperous; for it would have abandoned its message and lost its value for the world.

One can understand that this is sufficient for a subject who is in the United Kingdom. For the rest, the further question arises does the system permit of national, peaceful growth from dependency to nationhood.

Mr. Julian Huxley in No. 5, "Race in Europe," spoils an otherwise admirable exposure of the Race myth by his hesitation in rejecting the exclusive policies of Australia and America. He writes :

> So long as nationalist ideas, even in modified form, continue to dominate the world scene, the large scale segregation of areas, each developing its own general type of culture, may be the policy to pursue. If unrestricted immigration seems likely to upset such a policy, restriction is justifiable, as with Asiatic races in Australia and the United States. But do not let us in such cases make it a question of 'race', or become mystical on the subject, or justify ourselves on false biological grounds.

We do not think that a policy of persecution becomes any the more justifiable if it is undertaken on the ground that it interferes with the programme of a particular State than it is when it it is unscientifically directed against a "race." Mr. Huxley advocates a surrender of national sovereign rights as a cure for Europe's race problems. It is significant that he does not suggest a world-wide application of his remedy. Mr. Huxley's pamphlet is otherwise a convincing answer to the race politician of the day.

* * * *

From this exposure of the ideas underlying the policy of race-nationalism followed in Germany to the thirteenth pamphlet, "The Refugee Question" by Sir John Hope Simpson, is a logical transition. Sir John gives the result of Nazi policy and political persecution in Germany and elsewhere. Sir John's contribution is an objective one written unemotionally and it is invaluable as a suggestive record of the different steps taken to meet the problem. There are certain questions which arise out of the treatment of refugees in the countries in which they seek protection, which Sir John just hints at the close without dwelling on them. He asks why countries which suffer, for example, from a shortage of school-children should not take in the refugee children to make good the population lag. The obverse of this immediately occurs to any reader: What are those countries which are, all honour to them, so willing to help the refugee doing to remedy social inequalities and economic want in their own people? How does, again, Canada or Australia which have denied entry to Asiatic members of the same Empire with the same loyalties, now take in Central European refugees? There is another point. Sir John refers to the advantages gained by a country which takes in refugees. "The welcome," he writes, "extended by France to Russian and Armenian refugees has been repaid by the work done by them in the heavy industries" There is always the danger that that which is given in charity is often inferior to what is given as an obligation. It is the task of modern governments to see that too much is not expected from the gratitude of the refugee-citizen.

* * * *

An outstanding pamphlet in the series is the third one, R. C. K. Ensor on "Mein Kampf," an expanded report of his speech at Chatham House in May. The public in India is more familiar now than it was two years ago with the theories of Adolf Hitler but still the published accounts are one-sided. Mr. Ensor gives his readers, many of whom will have little inclination to go to the original book, a brief idea of the mainspring of Hitler's policies. There is a passage which will be read with special interest in India where we are witnessing a similar reaction in our national movement to the evils of city life. It runs :

> He is at heart country-bred; his hatred for what he saw and suffered in working-class Vienna is blistering; he regards great cities and factories as man-eaters, farms and craft-trades as man-makers. Beyond the industries required to provide war-material, he does not want any more than will create an autarkic reciprocity between town and country, each deriving all that it needs from the other and consuming the whole of the other's output.

WHEN EAST AND WEST DID NOT MEET.

(By Cautious Indian)

An article like the one, "In an Indian Home" published in last week's Reformer, loses a good deal of its importance owing to the writer's reticence. We have also not the other side of the case. For all her seeming frankness, "Suzanne Marye" has suppressed a good deal, no doubt out of consideration for her hosts. The inferences one can make are few. She had more than one host, though only one person emerges clearly out of her article, her friend; there is one servant—at the least—and a cook; a driver—since there is a car and the hostess-friend is able to say, "The car is back"; and a family cat. For the furniture, one plush chair and presumably more than one; a dining table; a table in the guest's room; a bed perhaps; a cupboard in the kitchen. The house has two floors. The bathroom is equipped in Indian style and a spartan one at that, with buckets of hot and cold water and a heavy brass lota. The guest had taken with her, we know for certain, one bottle of milk of magnesia. It should not be difficult to locate the town, since it has a theatre—"Suzanne Marye" actually mentions more than one theatre and many cinemas in her second paragraph, though she describes only one visit—in which the language used is polished Urdu; a lunatic asylum and a river. Even the tea tells a tale. Down South the drink would have been coffee. In Bombay the tea would have been strong and hot, not weak and tepid except in some obscure districts; and this the town certainly is not with its cinemas and its lunatic asylum. "Suzanne Marye's" reactions to the "cool marble slab" in the bathroom give us approximately the season—obviously cold weather.

I turn from the properties to the characteristics of the "Indian home." The hosts are not orthodox or "Suzanne Marye" would not have found herself among them. They are not westernised in their ways, or else one might assume that there would have been a bath tub to delight the heart of their guest. They do not stint themselves in matters that concern a guest—e. g., the motor car, probably hired for the stay, the "lot of money" they spend to entertain one week-end Western guest. Yet living as they do in a city where it would not be difficult to fit up a comfortable bathroom, they do not seem to have provided for more than one bucket of hot water and one of cold. "Suzanne Marye" has allowed her horror at the marble slab to overcome her objective outlook. She does not mention the inevitable tap and surely the brass lota must have been less heavy than it looked. Europeans feel in their first contact with metal vessels that they must be unliftable. Had "Suzanne Marye" put her fears to the test she would have had a bath and faced the world more cheerfully. I wonder what her hostess must have thought when she saw the still full buckets of hot and cold water after the guest's "bath." As for the coldness of the slab, may I give a word of advice to those who might want to sit on it? One lotaful of hot water at the most, poured on the slab before settling down on it should suffice to keep the slab comfortable until it has taken on the body's heat. Those who question this, need not sit on the stab at all. The etiquette of the Indian bath does not compel one to sit on cold slabs.

Then as regards the food. The times for eating are perplexing in the extreme. Breakfast at ten o'clock for the guest, presumably earlier for the rest of the house; and certainly for "Suzanne Marye" and her hostess a long wait till three-thirty in the afternoon; tea any time between 3-45 and 4-30; and dinner not ready till near ten. The attitude of the hostess towards food seems neither Indian nor Western. No Indian would conceivably permit, much less compel, anyone to bathe immediately on top of a meal, there being a deep-rooted superstition against it. Still more inexplicable is the hostess' suggestion that rather than be late for the theatre they should skip the night meal. The Indian weakness is to overfeed a guest. Had "Suzanne Marye" been in a typical Indian home which was not used to the peculiarities of a Western guest, she would have had to go back time and again to her milk of magnesia but never to the kitchen cupboard for three tomatoes. By the way, the fact that there were just three tomatoes again the next day or rather night, indicates that the cook did believe it was an evil spirit which had eaten up the first three and had put in another lot to avert mischief.

At first thought one is inclined to think that the house to which the two friends went, was a picnic place—a house rigged up for the week-end. But then the incident would scarcely happen in the heart of a city,—the house is only fifteen minutes away from a theatre. As one discards this explanation, another, more possible one, takes its place: It seems very much as if "Suzanne Marye" is confusing two distinct experiences. The clapping of hands to call the servants, the indifference to the guest's hunger, have been imbibed from club gossip with fellow Europeans. The bathroom, the efforts to get something ready which might prove palatable to the foreign guest, the whole household upset out of its normal eating hours, belong to an actual visit. The first has the authentic club-room touch of lavish but incompetent hospitality which is rather fashionable since Aldous Huxley set down his impressions. The second is pure middle-class. If one reads the article in this light, it is understandable.

In the relations between the Indian girl and the French, there is much that is only explicable on the ground that the effusions of the Occidental,—there are two "dear's" in the conversation, both used by "Suzanne Marye"—gave the Indian girl the impression that they were better known to each other than they actually were. The general complaint of Europeans is that Indians are rather reluctant to ask them to their homes, however friendly they might be. If this Indian girl did so, she did it under the impression that it was more than a question of knowing each other "fairly well." On the other hand, the Frenchwoman took it as just another conventional invitation in which no one need get in the other's way. The Indian girl saw her mistake and tried to live up to her friend's conception. Then again the impression does strike one that, having invited her friend, the Indian hostess found either that her relations at home did not want to meet the friend or that she did not want her friend to see too much of, or be seen too much by, them. So she kept her out of the house as long as she could and, when she couldn't, kept them out of "Suzanne Marye's" way. This is not just the disillusionment of a Western visitor. One feels sorry also for the Indian girl whose impulsive invitation ended so disastrously. Things went wrong from the start and, if that was obvious to "Suzanne Marye," how much more must it have been to her who was evidently trying hard to fit a guest into her home. Had the guest stepped out of her contemplation of her own sorrows and thought a little of her friend's tribulations, the gulf might have been bridged. Water set for the guest's bath—and no bath! An elaborate dinner got ready, and no time to eat it in! And a weary cheerless guest all the time, for surely the hostess must have observed the reactions of her guest.

The moral is plain :—Entertaining is an art and not to be lightly undertaken. Indians who ask foreigners home, might do well to spend the first half-hour of the visit in discreetly pumping their guests on their personal habits. The less discreet the response of the guest, the better for all concerned.

THE REFUGEE PROBLEM.

Although exact figures of the number of refugees who left German territory during 1938 are not available, the report of the High Commissioner for Refugees to be submitted to the Assembly of the League of Nations at its next meeting puts the number at not less than 120,000 and notes that some estimates place it as high as 140,000. Many of these have not yet found a permanent home or obtained permission to earn their own livelihood. Large numbers are in countries of refuge awaiting facilities for emigration, and in Europe alone there are 60,000 persons who are wholly or partly dependent on private organisations for their maintenance. Many in desperation, the report continues, have left Germany for places such as Shanghai, where facilities for employment are quite inadequate for the number who have taken refuge there. At least 60,000 who left German territory in 1938 have found new homes and means of livelihood, being taken into other countries by infiltration, which, in contrast to the settlement of large groups, depends on the absorption of individuals into the various trades and occupations.

The United States of America, and Palestine, Australia and the countries of South America were the main contributors, but there are few places in the world which did not receive some of these unfortunate persons during the past year.

In regard to the possibility of a scheme of settlement in British Guiana, the High Commissioner summarises the position thus: A commission of specialists has reported that the possibilities are sufficiently good to justify the carrying out of experimental settlements and while it did not feel justified in giving any assurance regarding the success of these settlements, it does consider that if they are successful the ultimate prospects of the territory as an area for settlement on a big scale are very large. Practical plans for trial settlement are now being considered by the organisations concerned and, provided that the necessary funds can be raised, it is hoped that a beginning may be made in the near feature.

The High Commissioner concludes his report with a reference to the needs for a fund from which he can from time to time help the private organisations which are concerned with the refugees from Germany. By the decision of the Assembly, he cannot derive direct assistance from his humanitarian funds for refugees, but he is authorised to make allotments among such organisations as he may consider best qualified to administer such help. He points out, however, that urgent cases sometimes arise where immediate financial help would be more satisfactory and promptly performed if he were in a position to make a contribution. In addition, there is great scope for improving and extending the system of training in various countries; but, with the very heavy calls on their resources, the private organisations are unable to give adequate financial assistance, much as they would like to do so. The High Commissioner thinks that the League of Nations would be in a much stronger position to exercise its influence and to extend its part in this great humanitarian work if its representative were able from time to time to give some financial assistance to the private bodies which now have to bear practically the whole of the burden. The High Commissioner pays warm tribute to the magnificent work which these bodies are doing in difficult and depressing circumstances, and he adds that one of the very few redeeming features of the present tragedy is the manner in which thousands of workers are tackling the problem, which tends to increase rather than diminish.

VAISHNAVA CASTE MARKS.

(By N. C. Narsimha Acharya, Bombay.)

I am aware that many orthodox Vaishnavaites ignore a modern social reformer as belonging to a different sect of his own. But the Vaishnava religion itself claims to be a reformist religion broadbased on social uplift and social justice. One can now picture in his mind what must have been the feelings of the then orthodox against whose views the Vaishnava religion itself was started centuries ago. A religion that claims millions of votaries, has necessarily to be viewed from different angles. Such features of it as assume undue importance must necessarily be subjected to timely criticism in this modern age. A social reformer who moves in society, has got to take count of the ugly features that rear their head although he may not please the votaries of a religion by what may be regarded as unnecessary interference.

The South led the way to Vaishnavism which assumed different forms in various parts of the country. The Vaishnava followers of Sri Ramanujacharya have been for long divided into two sects—viz., the Vadagalais and the Thengalais. The Vadagalais are the northern sect and the Thengalais represent the southern sect. They count their adherents by millions throughout India and not merely in the Madras Presidency. The popularity of the Vaishnava religion can be traced to its unique appeal to the heart. The numerous sects and sub-sects professing Vaishnavism having its original root in the South all have this simplicity of its appeal to the heart in common. There is no doubt it is a growing religion. But the votaries of this great religion in the South are divided into two sects. Though in essence and spirit of religion they are one, they regard themselves as enemies on account of superficial differences. Tolerance has for long become conspicuous by its absence amongst them. At present the most outstanding difference is one of external marks. The adherents of the Thengalai sect wear a kind of mark popularly known as the "Y" mark. Those of the Vadagalai sect are distinguished by a mark approximately resembling the shape of "U." These marks have been for centuries the cause of serious differences between them. The other real differences in the essentials of religion have paled into insignificance before them. These marks have assumed an importance which has no parallel in any other province or country. Not a few of the ceaseless battles between the sects have been fought on account of them. They are the cause of an unbridgeable gulf that separates these two sects. Besides physical fights that usually mark processions and other important religious functions associated with the distribution of prasad, tirtha and other honours and emoluments of office in Vaishnava temples, even legal wars have been the order in the British courts of justice. I need not say that fabulous sums have been spent on both sides from time to time.

These wars and feuds show no signs of abatemen On the other hand the external marks perpetuate and prolong them in public places of religion as well as in law courts. Not a few of the Vaishnavas are led to regard these fights as surely a part of religious duty on account of the distinctive marks they are enjoined to wear. They do not care to regard the spirit of religion as of any importance. The only thing of importance for all practical purposes is the caste mark, which feeds and perpetuates the acrimony between them and leads sometimes to unseemly fights.

Whatever justification for these external differences once existed, in these days of modern enlightenment, one can not regard with equanimity the idea of law courts being used for purposes of settling differences between religious sects on the basis of their external marks of religion if other methods of physical violence have not sufficiently answered the purpose of these warring sects. It is a pity that educated Vaishnavas and other legal gentlemen espouse these respective causes and lend the weight of their support to carry these fights to their bitter end. One would wish these differences—if differences they at all are—settled by the force of a healthy public opinion.

The Hindu-Muslim differences are already commencing to be regarded as insurmountable. But the sight of people of the same religion perpetuating differences leading to fights attended with violence and to legal battles in courts of law—the differences being based not in essentials but in subsidiaries and superficial marks—is deplorable indeed. Quite recently leave was applied for and granted by the Madras High Court on behalf of the head of one sect who felt dissatisfied with the decision of the Madras High Court to appeal to the Privy Council therefrom.

There the question was as regards which form of religious songs sung by the votaries of these respective sects should be sung first and which last in the famous Tirupati temple which draws millions of Vaishnavas from all parts of the country. Here again there was no dispute as to the songs themselves but as to which of them should be sung first—one party contending that songs should precede mantras and the other pleading for a vice versa procedure. The highest tribunal of the British Empire is to determine which order is to be followed, the Vaishnavas of both the sects anxiously awaiting the decision in the meanwhile.

The fact which I would like to emphasise, is that the root cause of dispute is of such a superficial character as to originate in the kind of marks these rival sects wear. They are the marks and monuments of religion which eclipse and render nugatory the essentials of religion professed by them and that lead to ceaseless struggle and strife. In short, it is these external marks that constantly relight and fan the flame of bitterness and division between them and make them blind to the realities of the religion professed by them. One should pause at this stage and ask, without meaning any offence to the present day exponents of the tenets of these rival sects, whether they could not in these matters of mere form devise a mark—if a mark they should wear, and it be considered at all necessary—which may be regarded as common to both these sects. Is it not desirable that a joint conference presided over by the respective religious heads, should meet and devise a method whereby such a form may be selected as would appeal to both these warring sects? My view is that enlightened people and the educated people in the modern sense of the world, ought to see before it is too late that these battles over caste marks do end and their efforts lead to a rational way of understanding the essentials of religion.

SWORDS TO PLOUGHS.*

To keep our orientation in a warlike world: Guns can be very very useful to science and industry. There is the deep-sea gun which shoots samples out of the bottom of the ocean, to find radium perhaps, but more important by far—to determine the constitution of seven-tenths of the earth's crust, that land which lies beneath water—about which we are abysmally ignorant.

There is the gun that shoots holes in the casings of oil wells being drilled thousands of feet in the ground when it is desired to tap the liquid gold that is petroleum. And the gun that shoots open a clogged blast furnace outlet plugged with frozen slag. And the gun that shoots aloft distress signals from ships in distress, or the gun that flings the first rescuing line to wrecked ships.

Two agricultural inventions, barbed wire and tanks which are tractors under their armour skin, are of prime importance in war. Miles upon miles of the spiky wire hedges in European frontiers today.

Barbed wire is a U. S. A. invention in 1874. It was created to keep cattle at home. Now about 2,000,000 tons are produced a year,—about seven miles of wire to the ton.

Tanks evolved from tractors during the World War. Since then, tractors and trucks have mechanized armies, putting artillery and cavalry horses out of jobs—just as do tractors on the farms.

Showing how one invention stalemates another—tanks are the one good weapon for smashing down barbed wire entanglements, so infantry can get through.

Remember the Chinese invented gunpowder. But they used it mainly for fireworks during a thousand years—to celebrate weddings and the birth of children—proving it is not the thing, but the attitude of mind in those who use the thing.

Effective air disarmament is possible without interfering with the peacetime development or use of the airplane, the British Air Ministry's research director said only last month.

A previous technical stumbling block to abolition of the bomber has been eliminated by the last ten years of aviation progress.

Ten years ago, military and civil planes were so nearly alike, commercial craft could be easily converted into bombers so that any international limitation of bombers alone meant little.

Now, however, he asserted, commercial planes are so much slower than military ships that the commercial planes cannot be used in war. A limit on bombers might stick.

KAMALA NEHRU MEMORIAL.

"On the 19th instant," writes Gandhiji in Harijan "I had the privilege of laying the foundation stone of the Kamala Nehru Memorial Hospital in Allahabad before a large gathering. This hospital will be not only a fitting remembrance of the memory of a true devotee of her country and a woman of great spiritual beauty, it will be a redemption of the promise made to her by me that I would do what lay in my power to see that the work for which she had made herself responsible was carried on even after her death. She was going to Europe in search of health. The visit proved to be a search of death. As she was going she had invited me, if I could, either to join her for a brief talk during part of her journey to Bombay or to see her in Bombay. I went to Bombay. During the time that I was able to give her, she asked me, if she died in Europe, to try to see that the hospital which Jawaharlal had commenced in Swaraj Bhavan and which she had laboured to keep alive was put on a permanent footing. I told her I would do what I could. That promise was partly the foundation for the appeal, to which I had become party, for funds for the Memorial." The following passage is reproduced from the appeal: "All may not know that she was deeply interested in the work of the Congress Hospital opened in Swaraj Bhawan, Allahabad. She was a great humanitarian. She knew no distinction between caste and caste. Harijans were as much her care as other human beings. Her parting message to friends when she left India in search of a cure for the disease that was to take her away from our midst, was that the Congress Hospital should be maintained." The first donation received in response to this appeal was a house and a piece of land from Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru.

NOTES.

As Others See Us:—We reprint from the Spectator an account by a Frenchwoman of her experiences and impressions of Indian home life formed on a two days' visit at the home of an Indian friend whom she "rather liked." The Indian home was evidently that of a wealthy Zemindar of the old school. In middle class homes they do not clap hands to call the attention of servants. The guest, it would seem, was not lodged in the actual home of the family but in a guest house set apart for foreign guests. An Indian home at eight in the morning is not deserted. It is bustling with activity, the chatter of children, the goings to and fro of servants, the preparations for the day's crowded routine. The hostess's excuse that she believed that Europeans slept up to eleven o'clock in the morning, was true. Indians as a rule are early risers; and we remember a friend remarking half in joke that only the working classes got up so early in European countries. Whatever may be the case in Europe, in India few Europeans remain in bed until noon. The hostess evidently had learnt her notions of European habits at second-hand and not from actual observation. As regards the hours of meals, although not so punctilious as in European homes, there are meal-times, but as a rule Indian hosts consider it a part of hospitality not to insist on their observance by foreign guests and generally leave them free to follow their own habits. The same idea of hospitality often induces the Indian host to provide his foreign guest with food and drink which he and his family would not take. We heard recently from a friend that he had specially procured two bottles of champagne for the entertainment of a European guest, the unconsumed portion of which he afterwards poured down the sink. In an increasing number of cases nowadays Indian hosts do not adopt such devices, and it is being recognised by Indian hosts and European guests alike that such departures from the household custom are contrary to true hospitality. Our object in reprinting this article is that both sides should understand how small things may lead to misunderstanding and that a little preliminary explanation frankly asked and given would effectively prevent such misunderstanding. We should like to add that the case of the writer in the Spectator is so exceptional that our first impulse was that the whole thing was fictitious. Speaking generally, the routine of an Indian home is far less rigid than that of the European home, especially in the matter of meals. There are, as we have said, customary hours but no guest would have to go hungry because he came at an odd hour. Indians regard the clock as a convenience and not as a controller. Some of the finest Indians are by common assent allowed an unlimited latitude in the matter of time by their friends and relatives. In one case a much-loved friend who was expected for meals at eight in the evening turned up with two women friends at half past ten at night and smilingly ordered the sleepy hostess to bring out whatever was to be found in the house. This was cheerfully done and the memory of it remains fresh and fragrant. The friend, alas, is no more to shake up the house with his surprise visits.

Kamala Nehru Memorial Hospital:—Gandhiji laid last Sunday at Allahabad the corner-stone of a Maternity Hospital which is [illegible] completion, in memory of the late [illegible] Kamala Nehru whose death four years ago [illegible] after a protracted illness at the early age of 37 [illegible] much sorrow and sympathy for her bereaved husband. A short sketch of her life and work is given in the brochure issued by the Memorial Committee. We reprint it elsewhere. Notwithstanding precarious health, Mrs. Nehru threw herself heart and soul into the movement into which her redoubtable father-in-law had drawn his whole family; and in so doing displayed both loyalty and courage which won the admiration of a large circle of fellow workers. But in this respect hers is by no means a unique record. What was exceptional in her case was that she was the valiant helpmate of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. The Hospital is thus a memorial as much to the Pandit as to Mrs. Nehru. The lot of the wife of an active politician in these days, is hard. It is particularly so when the politics professed is revolutionary in colour if not in content. Brought up in conservative and exclusive surroundings, Mrs. Nehru bravely

NOTES.

As Others See Us :—We reprint from the Spectator an account by a Frenchwoman of her experiences and impressions of Indian home life formed on a two days' visit at the home of an Indian friend whom she "rather liked." The Indian home was evidently that of a wealthy Zemindar of the old school. In middle class homes they do not clap hands to call the attention of servants. The guest, it would seem, was not lodged in the actual home of the family but in a guest house set apart for foreign guests. An Indian home at eight in the morning is not deserted. It is bustling with activity, the chatter of children, the goings to and fro of servants, the preparations for the day's crowded routine. The hostess's excuse that she believed that Europeans slept up to eleven o'clock in the morning, was true. Indians as a rule are early risers; and we remember a friend remarking half in joke that only the working classes got up so early in European countries. Whatever may be the case in Europe, in India few Europeans remain in bed until noon. The hostess evidently had learnt her notions of European habits at second-hand and not from actual observation. As regards the hours of meals, although not so punctilious as in European homes, there are meal-times, but as a rule Indian hosts consider it a part of hospitality not to insist on their observance by foreign guests and generally leave them free to follow their own habits. The same idea of hospitality often induces the Indian host to provide his foreign guest with food and drink which he and his family would not take. We heard recently from a friend that he had specially procured two bottles of champagne for the entertainment of a European guest, the unconsumed portion of which he afterwards poured down the sink. In an increasing number of cases nowadays Indian hosts do not adopt such devices, and it is being recognised by Indian hosts and European guests alike that such departures from the household custom are contrary to true hospitality. Our object in reprinting this article is that both sides should understand how small things may lead to misunderstanding and that a little preliminary explanation frankly asked and given would effectively prevent such misunderstanding. We should like to add that the case of the writer in the Spectator is so exceptional that our first impulse was that the whole thing was fictitious. Speaking generally, the routine of an Indian home is far less rigid than that of the European home, especially in the matter of meals. There are, as we have said, customary hours but no guest would have to go hungry because he came at an odd hour. Indians regard the clock as a convenience and not as a controller. Some of the finest Indians are by common assent allowed an unlimited latitude in the matter of time by their friends and relatives. In one case a much-loved friend who was expected for meals at eight in the evening turned up with two women friends at half past ten at night and smilingly ordered the sleepy hostess to bring out whatever was to be found in the house. This was cheerfully done and the memory of it remains fresh and fragrant. The friend, alas, is no more to shake up the house with his surprise visits.

Kamala Nehru Memorial Hospital :—Gandhiji laid last Sunday at Allahabad the corner-stone of a Maternity Hospital which is [illegible] completion, in memory of the late [illegible] Kamala Nehru whose death four years ago [illegible] after a protracted illness at the early age of 37 [illegible] much sorrow and sympathy for her bereaved husband. A short sketch of her life and work is given in the brochure issued by the Memorial Committee. We reprint it elsewhere. Notwithstanding precarious health, Mrs. Nehru threw herself heart and soul into the movement into which her redoubtable father-in-law had drawn his whole family; and in so doing displayed both loyalty and courage which won the admiration of a large circle of fellow workers. But in this respect hers is by no means a unique record. What was exceptional in her case was that she was the valiant helpmate of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. The Hospital is thus a memorial as much to the Pandit as to Mrs. Nehru. The lot of the wife of an active politician in these days, is hard. It is particularly so when the politics professed is revolutionary in colour if not in content. Brought up in conservative and exclusive surroundings, Mrs. Nehru bravely

CONGRESS AND SOCIAL REFORM.

A Correspondent writes: "Mr. Jinnah, President of the Moslem League, has been insisting strenuous nationalism. We want to conquer the world not only without arms but with a minimum of the amenities which are needed to nourish our bodies and to keep alive our souls. We are writing generally: that these amenities were not wanting in this particular case does not affect our argument. If we had paid better heed to these things, we might have had Mrs. Nehru and many others who had paid the price similarly, still with us. Who can say? From the sketch of her life we do not gather that Mrs. Nehru was specially interested in or connected with maternity work. A memorial must be specifically related to the work of the person intended to be commemorated. There are few towns in India where a Maternity Home would be superfluous. They appropriately lay within the sphere of the local and Municipal administration. A memorial for Mrs. Nehru would in the hands of an imaginative artist have symbolised the awakening of the womanhood of India and of the world, to the dawn of a new era of opportunities for the service of humanity.

Sir S. Reed on Safeguards*:—The current number of the Journal of the East India Association, publishes a paper read by Sir William Barton at a meeting held last July and the discussion thereon under the Chairmanship of Sir Stanley Reed. Sir William Barton did his best to be impartial in his presentation of his subject, but he could not altogether veil the fact that his sympathies were with the Princes in their demand for more safeguards. He took the half dozen best-governed States and, without saying so, he throughout implied that they were a fair sam[illegible] of the five hundred and odd States. Nearly a[illegible] British speakers at the meeting were incline[illegible] to the same line except Miss Agatha H[illegible]son who rather grudgingly recognised that there were States "where the Princes have pioneered in a different kind of administration." For the rest, she saw only the gulf which separated the rulers from the ruled. The Maharaja of Burdwan reiterated a suggestion which he had made some years ago, to transfer the administration of British India to "the families to whom the country had belonged, without interfering with Indian or British trade or defence at all." He added: "If most of India were under the Indian States the demands of the Congress for complete independence could not be sustained, and the country on present lines must continue." The Maharaja did not realize that such a system would not be different from what has been ridiculed as "the puppet State" of Manchukuo in relation to Japan. The most striking contribution to the debate came from > inadequacy of the safeguards (and finally dissolving Federation). If there is one word, I have learnt to hate and abominate it is the word "safeguards." I think that history teaches us this: the more the safeguards, the less the safety, and that it is far better to pin your security to a few broad general principles than it is to set up a multitude of irritating, futile, entirely useless restrictions which cause a maximum of dissatisfaction and give a minimum of protection.

This is admirably put and, as Sir Stanley Reed, during his long career in India and since has been noted for his sympathetic handling of Indian States problems, and as he is in a better position than any of the retired politicals who spoke at the meeting to guage the present temper of the British public, Indian rulers will be wise to heed his warning.

Constituent Assembly:—The Tribune of Lahore commenting on a recent statement of Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya, late Prime Minister of Madras, that in electing representatives to the proposed Constituent Assembly separate electorates would be allowed to communities which desire them, points out that this practically amounts to abandoning one of the fundamental tenets of the Congress and would inevitably lead to the retention of separate electorates in the Constitution framed by an Assembly so constituted. We have heard it remarked in reply to similar objections, that when the Nazis had no difficulty about making up with the Bolsheviks whom they had until a few months ago been denouncing in the bitterest terms, Congress leaders should not hesitate to give up some of their cherished principles in order to present a united front in support of the Constituent Assembly. The argument is unanswerable if it is conceded that the Congress in relation to the Muslim League stands in the same relation as the National Socialist Party to the Comintern. But our objections to the Constituent Assembly are that it is difficult to convene, that, if convened, it can not frame a constitution for India which will be accepted by all concerned, and that without it a perfectly satisfactory constitution can be framed by men who have studied constructive politics, from the material available. In other words, it is not consent of an Assembly which under existing circumstances must be more or less a packed one, but the conditions and requirements of the country which should determine the form of the Constitution. The adoption of adult suffrage would automatically solve the question of communal electorates. The adoption of the indirect method, that is to say, election of representatives to the Legislature not by the voters directly but through delegates, would bring the system within workable proportions.

service by agitating about the number of seats in the Legislature and the proportion of jobs in the public services. It is to the credit of the Congress that it has come to realise the importance of social reform as the foundation of a healthy national life and stable political institutions.

WAR AND PROPAGANDA

which had subdued its anti-Congress tendencies during the two and a quarter years of provincial autonomy, is now finding out the weaknesses of the old administration, when the party cannot profit by the criticism. On the other hand, the newspapers which are friendly to the Congress, display the gravest anxiety lest the Governors should reverse the policies initiated by Congress ministries. In Bihar, we are told, the first steps have been taken to abandon the social programmes set on foot by Mr. Sri Krishna Sinha and his colleagues. This is not surprising and the other provinces may have to go through the same process. If the Congress regarded its social and economic measures as all-important, its ministries should not have left their posts on what is after all a political issue. It would be too much to expect that the Governors, many of whom probably do not believe in the policies they acquiesced in under popular administrations, should now strain every nerve to pursue Congress policies when the Congress itself has relegated them to second place in relation to its pursuit of a political objective. As a matter of fact one cannot resist the thought that had the political aims of the Congress been conceded by the British, today the Congress provincial ministries might themselves have accepted great modifications of their constructive schemes in order to help in the prosecution of the war.

Congress Working Committee on the situation:—The resolution of the Congress Working Committee passed at its meeting at Allahabad on Thursday is characterised, so far as it relates to the present political situation, by almost unexpected self-restraint and sobriety. We trust that Lord Zetland will not be misled by it into believing that Indian opinion has been cowed down by his "strong" line. The Congress has a difficult task in controlling its following brought up in the tradition of non-co-operation. Its immediate concern is to restrain it from starting on the routine of non-co-operation now that the Congress Ministries have returned to the wilderness. It will be extremely unwise for the British Government not to take advantage of the door which the Working Committee has deliberately left open for further negotiations. Already trouble is reported from Bihar which may spread easily to other provinces. The social programme of Congress Governments is in danger of being scrapped on the ground of financial stringency, which is not altogether ungrounded. A timely gesture at this juncture will go far to ease the situation and we earnestly trust it will not be withheld.

French semi-official press agencies, alike to suppress portions of President Roosevelt's radio talk on American neutrality. That striking final sentence, which we heard here toward the early morning hours with our ears, about the hope that there would be no black-out of peace in America, has not yet been heard by more than a handful of European individuals. What a pity that America cannot send a squadron of airplanes over Great Britain the time-lag between opinion and fact is rather vague, the tendency particularly in a modern war is for all facts to become a matter of opinion. The public had many examples of this during the active stages of the Sino-Japanese conflict, and journalists in Europe and America regarded the contradictions in the Chinese and the Japanese accounts of engagements as a peculiarly amusing feature of Oriental warfare. As a matter of fact, the humour of the situation largely arose out of the immediate and side-by-side publication of "official" accounts released by two combatants, greatly assisted by the attitude of sceptical detachment adopted in the first place by the neutral press. As for the distortion of reports to which the Editors refer, much of it seems obviously ill-advised. There was a particularly unhappy instance of this in India. In reviewing the first month of the War in a broadcast speech on October 1, Mr. Winston Churchill made a reference to the attitude of the Empire in the War. He said:

> We have other resources. We have the oceans, and with the oceans the assurance that we can bring the vast latent power of the British and French Empires to bear upon the decisive points. We have the freely-given ardent support of the 20 millions of British citizens in the self-governing Dominions of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. We have, I believe, the heart and the moral conviction of India on our side. We believe we are entitled to the respect and goodwill of the world, and particularly of the United States.—The Listener, October 5, 1939; Page 679.

In the reports published in India the words, "I believe," which qualified the reference to India were dropped. That this was not inspired by a desire to economise on words, appears from the fact that the "we believe" of the next sentence was not similarly omitted. It was not unnatural for Indians to infer from Mr. Churchill's reported speech that he and other British politicians assumed direct responsibility for India's support to Britain. Mr. Churchill's past utterances on India, we must concede, do lead one to accept as authentic any report which represents him as claiming a special and unique knowledge of India's wishes and opinions. This makes it all the more necessary that his speeches should be reported accurately in this country, in justice to him. No one who reads the passage which we have quoted above, can miss the distinction between the certainty of the support from the Empire units which have received self-government, and the hesitancy with which Mr. Churchill assesses India's attitude. Mr. Churchill is an artist in words. He would not have introduced into his speech phrases which bring vividly the difference between self-government and dependence unless he intended to produce this effect. Much less would he have done so inadvertently.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, November 25, 1939.

CONGRESS AND SOCIAL REFORM.

A Correspondent writes: "Mr. Jinnah, President of the Moslem League, has been insisting that the Indian National Congress is a Hindu organisation. Lord Zetland had recently repeated the same description. Gandhiji has written in the Harijan repudiating this description as unwarranted. Mr. Jinnah when he speaks of Congress being a Hindu movement, no doubt refers to the present Congress, the Congress as it has come to be. For he was himself a member of the Congress for many years, which he would not have been if it was a purely Hindu movement. For sometime past, present-day Congress leaders have been speaking of themselves as continuing the tradition of its founders although, as a matter of fact, the Liberals who are the real inheritors of the tradition are kept out of it. There is little that is common between the Congress today and the Congress before the Gandhiian era, except the name. The fundamental difference regarding the relation to British rule alone marks off the two as distinct bodies. Their attitude to the communal question is another. The original Congress deliberately excluded social and religious problems from its purview on the ground that they were peculiar to each community and must be dealt with by each community for itself. They could have no place in a national movement which should confine itself to subjects of common import. So strictly was this ban interpreted, that even the humanitarian proposal to raise the Age of Consent from 10 to 12 years, was ruled out as inadmissible on the Congress agenda. This is not the case now. The Congress though it still thinks of itself as a national movement, has been showing special concern for Hindu solidarity by its action in regard to the removal of untouchability, not only with reference to civil rights but with reference also to such an intimately socio-religious matter as entry into temples. This is all the more remarkable because the exclusion of antyajas from places of worship in Madras, for instance, is practised in several Christian Churches as regards converts from these classes. The Maharaja of Travancore based his famous Proclamation on his rights as a Hindu ruler. The Madras Government was composed of Hindus and non-Hindus, though the Premier and the majority of his colleagues were Hindus. The Congress majority in the Legislature which passed the law validating temple entry, was likewise a composite majority without any title to a religious mandate. The same is true of the Bombay legislation on the subject. In this matter the Congress Governments surely were conscious of standing in a special relation and possessing special responsibilities to the Hindu community. If it was a national non-communal movement like the older Congress, it should have left the question of temple entry alone. It can not play fast and loose with principles."

Our correspondent might have added that the very fact that the Congress is negotiating with the Moslem League about concessions to Muslims instead of relying on its own Nationalist Muslim members, shows that it does not stand upon its own national pedestal.

On analysing our correspondent's reasoning however, one is led to a conclusion quite the reverse of his. The Reformer from the very first regretted the abstention of the Congress from social questions. Indian nationalism with social questions left out has no meaning. The so-called political topics to which it confined itself, only superficially touched the life of the people. That being our view, the fact that Congress now deals with social questions is its best claim to be a national movement. That it has so far dealt only with Hindu social questions and only with one of them, and has completely ignored the same or similar questions relating to non-Hindus, is obviously due to its belief that while the temple question is ripe for solution among Hindus, the Church and mosque question is not yet ripe for it. When Christian opinion demands legislation regarding the rights of untouchable converts, the Congress, we are sure, will not hesitate to act as it has acted with reference to Hindu temples. As for negotiations with the Muslim League, we see from the papers that the Congress Working Committee is negotiating with Ahrars, Shias and other Muslim groups besides the Moslem League. As we have often said communal organisations are not necessarily anti-national. Social problems are more expeditiously solved only by means of them. The Muslim League would have been several times more significant than it is both for Muslims and for India as a whole, if it had not practically excluded social reform from its programme. Most problems are common to Hindus and Muslims. But while for over a century, Hindu reformers, have been agitating for reforms, Muslims have stood aloof, so much so that when the Age of Consent Committee reported that child marriages were prevalent also among Muslims, Mr. Jinnah confessed that the information surprised him as he had all along thought that child marriages were confined to Hindus. Purdah, polygamy and other disabilities of women are shared by Hindus and Muslims. But while the Hindus have been exerting themselves to get rid of them, Muslim leaders have maintained an attitude of indifference and have even sometimes opposed measures introduced by Hindu members in the Legislature. Women's franchise, age received much less support from Muslim than from Hindu leaders. The Muslim League has in all these directions much good work to do. Unless the Muslim League leaders take up these and other questions they will not be doing service by agitating about the number of seats in the Legislature and the proportion of jobs in the public services. It is to the credit of the Congress that it has come to realise the importance of social reform as the foundation of a healthy national life and stable political institutions.

WAR AND PROPAGANDA.

(By Devere and Marie H. Allen)

Bewilderment—no other word quite so adequately describes public opinion throughout most of the world as we slide into the first few weeks of our newest large-scale war. Bewilderment not so much because of fundamental ideas or of deep-lying emotions, certain to be rendered sharper as the fighting grows more intense. But bewilderment because the present war from its first hour has exceeded anything hitherto known in human history for the severity of censorship and the deliberately-fostered lack of information; and bewilderment, too because for weeks and even months in advance of the conflict, information had been suppressed or warped in the totalitarian countries completely and in the countries lined up against authoritarianism, almost as much.

Perhaps the most discouraging thing discernible anywhere is the pathetic fact that thousands of otherwise intelligent persons go through critical situations completely unaware of the world about them. Here in Brussels, where we have established the headquarters of the No-frontier News Service, Americans, Britons, Irish, Scandinavians and men and women of various other nationalities have stopped midway in panic-stricken flight from the war zones on their way to more familiar scenes. Pathetic are they, often, for the bitter circumstances of their flight; but pathetic in another sense, for a large percentage of them hardly knew what had been taking place for weeks before September 1st. Some of them had travelled thousands of miles through countries now at war but had not discussed political conditions with anyone and had not read a newspaper in any language since last spring. This, probably, is the most terrifying, or at any rate the most discouraging thing, about humanity—its resolute unwillingness to face facts and its continuous temptation to live in a world surrounded solely by one's own interests and desires.

But had these thousands wished to find the facts, they would have had their work cut out. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free," is a preachment that has long since been anathema to politicians and the press. Most of our really good newspaper correspondents from America are sincere, well-informed, hard-working and resourceful writers. Many of them, it is true, have been led by high fees from broadcasting corporations and by the very nature of thir trade, to let their histrionic impulses run riot in the face of growing tensity. But given a thousand perfect correspondents equipped with everything that could be needed for the discovery of truth: the picture they would have to paint of current happenings would be surrealistic, all the same.

Silence, the foreign offices believe, will win the war. They will soon learn better, for nothing is so devastating to the friendliness of neutral nations or the morale of war-shocked populations, as distrust of all the news they hear. And when the impression is steadfastly built up day after day that all the important happenings are known only to a few at the top, the result in the minds of the masses is unwholesome from everybody's point of view.

War-time exigencies, for example, led official British radio broadcasters, and one of the big French semi-official press agencies, alike to suppress portions of President Roosevelt's radio talk on American neutrality. That striking final sentence, which we heard here toward the early morning hours with our ears, about the hope that there would be no black-out of peace in America, has not yet been heard by more than a handful of European individuals. What a pity that America cannot send a squadron of airplanes over Great Britain, France, Italy, Poland, Germany, and other states totalitarian in the handling of news, whether in war or peace, and drop fifteen million leaflets setting forth the simple facts of international events!

Radio warfare has now grown more severe. Until the war broke out, German interference had often disrupted the broadcasting of British and French points of view by short-wave to foreign countries in their native tongues. Now the Germans are getting a stiff dose of their own medicine, and night after night, when German broadcasters attempt to speak in English or in French, to give their own distorted picture of events, their voices have a hard time breaking through the clamour and shriek of signals set up to drown them out completely.

Fairness must compel any honest observer to pay a certain tributes to the British. Once again they will become ardent propagandists, it is certain. But in the first days of the war, there was a balance in their official reports that was refreshing. They have not hesitated to state that reports of bombing of hospitals and civilians by the Germans might very well have been due not to planned terrrorization at all, but to the ease by which attacks on military objectives can, in modern war, result in grave injury to non-combatants. This is something new, compared to the first few days of the war a quarter of a century ago. May they keep it up! It will win them friends.

By a thousand, thousand examples, the tendencious character of pre-war publishing and reporting, could be shown. Sometimes the distortion is important, sometimes it is minor but even then revealing. When Mr. Hore Belisha spoke in Paris before the Association of Great Britain, in early August, he talked of "our General Gamelin – for you know he belongs to us as well." The official text of the speech appeared later, for public dissemination, with the word "our" struck out.

One of America's well-known columnists, who has been a persistent campaigner for war if need be to defeat Hitlerism, but who has done very little to promote the important underlying economic changes which might give a basis for a peaceful Europe, had this to say, weeks ago: "Since the Axis Powers are more or less sure of American intervention in a coming war, Hitler therefore is trying to sell Americans the thought that the United States in a European war would primarily serve British imperialist interests." You get the idea—anyone striving to keep America out of participation in the war is virtually doing Hitler's job.

The Week, a mimeographed newssheet sent out from London, recently ran an article showing that German oil and gasoline consumption in wartime would be 40 percent higher than Germans anticipated, and citing a report by oil experts in substantiation. The conclusion was drawn and paraded through that portion of American public opinion which feeds on such releases, that Germany would be so short of oil that its only recourse was the immediate conquest of Rumania. But not a word about the oil being sold in large quantities to Hitler and Mussolini by Soviet Russia. The Week is Stalinist in point of view and its editor, something not known widely in America even by those who use his writings in their pages, was correspondent for some time during the Spanish War, in Spain, for British Communist publications.

Take, for another example, the writings of Madame Genevieve Tabouis, whose brilliant work for the French paper "L'Oeuvre" has won her a world-wide reputation. It is not necessary to detract from much excellent work that she has done to point out that her remarkable prestige in America rests upon slender foundations. Regularly for months she has been making sensational "inside news" reports, and predictions of forthcoming events. Regularly and systematically she has been wrong. In the April 13th issue of her paper she stated definitely that Germany would invade Holland and Poland on April 15th. She recently reported in the British press what Britons naturally would like to believe, that Hitler had been forced by discontent within the ranks of his own party officials to inaugurate another purge – that some had been shot, and as many as 80,000 expelled from the Nazi party. Nobody else has heard of these events, least of all well-trained observers we have talked with since that time, and who have been in favourable positions to find out such happenings in Germany.

For many weeks before the war, the servile French press had published only what the government desired. The Paris satirical newspaper, "Le Canard Enchaine," with its usual rapier-like wit, ran a cartoon during the ministerial scandal that the war has now erased, depicting two friends in conversation. One of them says "Have you any news about the scandal?" The other replies, "No. I can't read English." True, the English press had commented on the affair, if very sketchily, but typical Frenchmen never heard of it.

The London "Times," Conservative and influential organ of the British upper classes, refused last summer to print letters from prominent British publicists, and national figures, pointing out how they had been misrepresented in its columns. The same paper, in reporting the proceedings at Teacher's College, New York, of the Congress on Education for Democracy, ignored the fact that speakers held different points of view on the role of the United States in a general war, and printed only the addresses of the British spokesmen. Such a distinguished figure as Dr. Charles A. Beard, who is known to hold dissenting views on such questions as those discussed by the British speakers, received not one line in this great British paper.

In France, certain corps of correspondents from neutral countries have gone so far as to offer their services to the French government en masse, to give their talents for what must clearly be official propaganda. We hold no brief for Congressman Hamilton Fish, and we do not necessarily approve of all his activities for American isolationism. But when he proposed a conference of European statesmen to avert war, he was met in the French press not with logical arguments but with a downpour of abuse, one paper going so far as to say, in great headlines, "When Hitler uses an American loud-speaker."

Whatever Americans may think about involvement in the war, whatever they may feel about staying out of war and yet shipping munitions to France and Britain, it seems reasonably clear that the more than 70 per cent who, in a recent poll of the Institute of Public Opinion, stated it would be their judgment that America would be dragged in, did so in full knowledge of the attitudes taken in the past by their President and their Secretary of State. Certainly it was a view of what might happen, not a wish. Vast sections of the European press in the countries now arrayed against Germany systematically distorted this poll, however, so that millions of Europeans are convinced that the American people want soon to enter the war.

But Americans need not look across the water for examples of the danger to which they are exposed. Remember the stories that came over the radio and through the American newspapers, last spring, about the overwhelming preponderance of the German air fleet? Remember that Lindbergh was supposed to have testified that the United States was vulnerable in the face of possible air raids from abroad? Remember the bitter attacks made in numerous circles in Washington and in the press, on Americans who disputed the fantastic figures that were being used, and who said that through a combination of technics and geography America was comparatively secure against aerial bombardment? Remember, too, though it was more or less buried in the inside pages and scarcely at all put over the air that at long last, Lindbergh himself found it necessary to tell a group of Congressmen that the United States was in no danger of attack by the air from abroad? Yet the fanfare had done its work, which was to prepare American public opinion for enormous aircraft appropriations, ostensibly to build a mammoth air fleet to make America safe from the air fleet she herself had built up, first of all, by export of motors and sale of licenses, in Hitler's Germany.

What is not covered at all by the press is often as significant as what is played up in large headlines. A regular staff writer of "The New Statesman and Nation," for example, asserts that at the Lima Conference, the entire British press was only represented by one local resident. He received the following telegraphic instructions: "Send 50 words on the opening of the Conference: nothing subsequently unless there is an assassination."

It will behoove everyone who cares for truth to be perpetually on the alert, not against honest opinions or emotions, but against the overpowering impact of what was admirably called by a British writer on the eve of war, "Hashish administered to make you feel happy about killing people who have got into the hands of the wrong party organizers."

COMMUNAL UNITY IN INDIA.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam)

If the Hindus and the Moslems come to terms, it is easy as I said to conclude terms with other minorities. There remain two other important interests, viz the British interests in India, and the interests of the Princes (presuming that the subjects of Indian States would be treated identically on the same terms as British Indians whether via a Constituent Assembly or otherwise). It is to be admitted that these interests stand on a different level from the interests of the various communities.

My own view is that both these interests being represented by persons who are out and out realists they are not likely to put up terms which could not be acceptable to a free India, that is to say the moment that a compromise is reached between Hindus and Moslems, these interests would cease to be a formidable obstacle to the freedom of India, such as could not be come to terms with.

I have advisedly used the expression 'coming to terms' because in my view the notion that these interests have no rights, being creations of Imperialism, has no substance in real politics, or even in ethics. It is only a Soviet Republic which could entirely repudiate the past. Democracy and Hindu dharma does not.

Besides, excepting Gandhiji who is an absolute believer in Satyagraha as a political weapon in lieu of force, other Congress leaders do believe in the need for force for running governments, and as I have pointed out repeatedly, Congress Premiers depended on the police and the military and not Satyagraha during their distinguished regimes. The need for force being admitted, and the need also consequently admitted of the help of the British Navy and Air Force for many years to come, it follows, unless there is mental obscurity, that apart from other considerations, the British must, as pointed out by Lord Zetland, be a necessary part for arriving at any settlement concerning India, and hence necessarily with their 'creatures', namely British interests in India and the Princes. The only way in which the Congress would be enabled to get over the problem is through successful mass civil disobedience after winning over the Moslems and other political parties, so as to avoid what Gandhiji calls criminal war in India.

At the risk of being considered prolix let me state again that mass civil disobedience is a political weapon and is not satyagraha or soul force. It is not correct to say that satyagraha is responsible for the great strength of the Congress in India and for its having ruled eight provinces. It might just as well be argued that murder is responsible for Soviet Russia or Concentration Camps for the German and Italian governments. The real causes are more profound—namely the urge of different peoples in greater or less travail for self-expression and the uncanny powers of leadership possessed by Lenin, Stalin, Hitler, Mussolini and Gandhiji—powers which are beyond the capacity of abstract reasoning to explain except by saying that these men embodied, focussed and led those urges. The ideologies which they have severally advocated are easily capable of damaging criticism.

Taking satyagraha, complete non-violence and soul force cannot be an adequate tool for the government of a state or even of a family, as is proved by the instance of Congress ministries already quoted. If the British Government had allowed Gandhiji to administer through his disciples any single province without help from the Police and military, the administration of that province would have broken down during the course of a few weeks, if not days. Let me assert again that it is what may be called the decency of the British—that is their unwillingness to shoot down unarmed and non-violent men and women combined with the urge of the masses towards freedom and self-expression, and their faith in Gandhiji, which has led to this striking success. Non-violence was a streak of genius, but it was political genius. The Viceroy's statement dated 5th November concerning Provincial governments and the Central government is somewhat obscure unless it is the fact—although not admitted in so many words—that His Excellency has now realised the truth of what I wrote ten years ago, and what Mr. S. Srinivasa Iyengar has now been arguing, viz, that it is only if there are all-party governments in the Provinces that there could be an all party government at the centre at present. The Viceroy in that case is following the British example and probably, according to His Excellency's opinion, this is only a make-shift arrangement during the war, after which party governments would again take shape.

My view, on the other hand, is that this is the best form of government even during Peace and that, as stated by Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar, it is the only form which is suited to a country like India, in which even the best of men have not ceased to put their community or religion in the first rank, and the nation second, in spite of loud assertions to the contrary. It is my firm belief that working together as a group and finding that religion and culture are protectable by the group concerned, communal differences would daily tend to diminish. If these ideas had been adopted ten years ago, India would have been a very different country and the Hindu-Moslem problem would not have been at all acute.

In case, however, the Congress should not agree to resume office, in the shape of coalition governments, and prefers to return to office as a party government, I hope that they and the Viceroy would find it possible to co-operate at the centre in a war cabinet with a fixed number of members instead of selections for each occasion and representing all parties. Such a cabinet could also greatly help in the framing of the new constitution.

In such a war cabinet the Princes would naturally be represented. In this connection, I hope to be excused for mentioning an instance of foresight on my part. I have already stated elsewhere that there are a dozen features in the memorandum leading to the Government of India Act which are just what I had advocated and that the omissions have given rise to great difficulties. One of these refer to Privy Councillors. What Lord Samuel said recently was one of the suggestions in my scheme also—under the British Constitution the Privy Councillors could be made use of to a greater extent than is the case; and in India by appointing representatives of the Princes and of the ministers as Privy Councillors, the questions of Defence, Foreign Affairs and Paramountcy could be settled in India. If the Congress does not contemplate an absolute break, these are lines along which Dominion Status could be established without violence to the British Constitution. I hope I could say now that, when it was stated in Parliament that no alternative scheme had been suggested by anyone, the meaning was that no elaborate scheme had been submitted and none from any responsible leader. The outlines of the Scheme submitted by me to the Secretary of the Simon Commission was an alternative scheme, and events have proved that at any rate it had the merit of attempting to tackle the difficulties probably better suited to India which have since arisen—communal difficulties, difficulties about Princes and Dominion Status.

Gandhiji has stated that although his creed is non-violence his desire is that the Allies should win. Why he allowed his followers to cease co-operating with a party which he desired to win, he has not explained. All wish that the war should cease at the earliest moment; but India's prestige will not diminish if she joins the Allies in full co-operation, in spite of any mistakes and blemishes. If Gandhiji persuades the Congress to co-operate, perhaps the leverage so obtained might stop the war earlier; and with this prestige he might be able to help in creating a world order less dependent on Force and with less hatred between nations and individuals. Non-co-operation might lead to India being split into rival warring communities.

KAMALA NEHRU.

Kamala Nehru was the daughter of Pandit Jawahar Mal Kaul. She was born in Delhi on the 1st of August, 1899. In her seventeenth year she married Jawaharlal Nehru on Vasant Panchami Day, 6th February 1916. Their daughter and only child, Indira, was born on the 19th November 1917.

Exceptionally emotional and keen-minded, Kamala took an absorbing interest in the affairs around her. When Pandit Motilal Nehru joined the non-co-operation movement, Anand Bhawan became a throbbing centre of national activities. It became a second headquarters to the Satyagraha movement. Pandit Jawaharlal was always in the forefront of the struggle. Frequently Gandhiji was an honoured visitor. Kamala watched their activities with pride and imbibed her first lessons in patriotism and public service from these living models. A sensitive idealism enriched her emotional outlook and she was irresistibly drawn to the field of action. In 1922 she took active part in the movement for national freedom. It was mostly organisational work. She played no spectacular role.

In 1926 came the first serious breakdown in Kamala's health. Treatment in Europe was advised. So she went to Switzerland accompanied by her husband and her daughter Indira. She spent a year and nine months there and returned to India in December 1927.

Events in India began to move at a quicker pace and Kamala felt like a seasoned soldier returning to service. The launching of the Satyagraha movement in 1930 gave Kamala her longed-for opportunity. She threw herself into the work of organising volunteers. Her work won all-round admiration and revealed her remarkable powers of organisation. With her sister-in-law, Krishna Nehru, she herself donned the uniform of a volunteer and participated in processions and demonstrations of defiance. Her health though partially restored was still delicate, but she did not reckon with the risk. She was an embodiment of the awakened womanhood of the country and the passion for service was always over-powering. Government's method of dispersing meetings and processions by lathi charges left a large number of wounded Congressmen in every town who had to be carefully nursed back to health. In Allahabad Kamala took up the work. The Congress Hospital at Anand Bhawan was her chief care.

Early next year Kamala was nominated as a substitute member of the Working Committee. The Committee at that time was an unlawful association. She was arrested and sentenced to six months imprisonment.

Kamala's strenuous activities had told upon her health. In jail it deteriorated. She was released before her time owing to the fatal illness of Pandit Motilal Nehru.

Kamala never recovered her health. The revived movement for freedom found her an invalid. From the ailing bed she could give to the struggle only her silent support.

The illness followed an erratic course. Distinguished doctors at Bombay, Calcutta, Allahabad and Lucknow were consulted and there were quick relapses. Kamala bore the frequent and prolonged separations from Jawaharlal occasioned by his imprisonments with cheerfulness and great fortitude. But such rigid self-control itself drained the energies she needed for fighting the disease. She grew steadily worse. In 1934 she went to Bhowali. Jawaharlal who was then in Almora Gaol was permitted to see occasionally.

In the summer of 1935 she was taken to Europe. She spent many months in a sanatorium in Badenweiler in the Black Forest of Germany. On receipt of the news that her condition was critical Jawaharlal was released from gaol on the 4th September 1935. He flew to Europe. For over five months he nursed her. After a few tantalising rallies, the end came peacefully on 28th February 1936.

IN AN INDIAN HOME.*

(By Suzanne Marye.)

Not long ago I received an invitation from a girl friend to come and pass some days with her and her people. As I knew her fairly well and rather liked her, I accepted the kindly offer with thanks.

Like most Indians, my hosts were charming. They tried to give me as good a time as they could. They took me to cinemas, theatres, excursions, without stop or cease. They were spending quite a lot of money to entertain me. Yet, to tell the truth, I was not enjoying my visit. My tribulations started from the very first morning. I had asked the previous night: "What time is breakfast?" "Don't you trouble about it," said my friend. "Any time that suits you will suit us. You have just to clap your hands three times and the maid will bring it up for you."

This sounded just perfect, but in the morning it proved disastrous. I woke up around eight, and clapped my hands thrice. Then I lay back, awaiting the arrival of the breakfast-tray. It didn't come. Well, I clapped my hands again, a little more loudly. No response of any kind. Perhaps it is too early, I said to myself, and tried to loll a little longer in the bed. Then I consulted my watch. Nine o'clock. Once more I clapped my hands. In vain. May be they are expecting me downstairs, I reflected. So, having hastily dressed, I made my way up into the dining-room. It was completely deserted. There was not even a cloth on the table. I went into the drawing-room. Only the family cat lay purring on a plush chair. Seeing me, she raised her head and uttered something quite impolite.

I returned to my room, and began to listen for voices. Not a sound, except the mad chirping of sparrows in the trees. I sat down at the table, and wrote a letter or two. Then, seeing that there was no way to make my presence felt, and badly wanting a cup of tea, I descended again and took to perambulating in the compound. The cat was there. I tried to caress her, but she sneezed in my face and rushed off, as though she was unused to human society. At last, when I had given up all hope of breakfast, my friend appeared, smiling in her usual pretty way. "Already up!" she cried. "We thought you Europeans slept until at least eleven. Well, your breakfast has been sent up. Do go and eat it or it will get cold."

I hurried back to my room. The tea was watery and quite cold. I groaned. However, I gulped down a cup. Then I took some toast. It tasted like rubber. I had no luck. I was ferociously hungry. I turned to an Indian dish. It smelled nice. I took a mouthful. Delicious. I gobbled up the whole lot. Soon after I began to feel ill. It was as though I had swallowed a ton of iron. I agonised for quite a while, and did not begin to feel myself until I had taken two stiff doses of milk of magnesia. The morning was completely spoiled for me. What would I not have given for a hot cup of real good tea!

Here a servant entered and announced that the bath was ready. A bath so soon after breakfast! "All right," I said, trying my best to look composed. I went into the bathroom, just to see what it looked like. I was surprised. There was no tub. On the cement floor stood a marble slab, and by its side were two buckets of water, one hot and one cold, and a shining brass lota. Was I going to sit on that cold marble slab? And how was I going to manipulate that heavy brass lota? No, a bath was out of the question. I returned to my room in some perplexity. My friend was waiting for me there. "Well, you look fine," she said. "I hope you enjoyed your breakfast and bath?

"Fine!" I said.

"Well, the car is back. If you'll get ready, we'll go for a drive."

I thought she would leave me to complete my toilet; but on she remained where she was, watching interestedly everything I did. This was irksome.

We went to the public gardens, to the riverside, to the bazaars, to the local lunatic asylum, which, for some obscure reason, is considered a place worth visiting. It was nearly two-thirty in the afternoon when, tired and dusty, we returned home. I was very hungry. I wished they would hurry up and provide the luncheon. But it did not appear for another hour. By that time my appetite was gone. I could not eat anything. Hour of siesta. Scarcely had I closed my eyes when the maid came in with the tea-tray. This was too soon, I took a cup of tea all the same, but it was tepid and had a salty taste. A little later, my friend brought me a plateful of sweets and dried fruits. I longed to eat, but could only nibble. The meal hours seemed to me perfectly crazy. Nothing for a long time, and then an avalanche of food. I simply could not catch up with Indian ways.

Seven o'clock came and went. Eight, nine, yet no dinner. Then my friend burst into my room and said excitedly that we would be going to a theatre that evening. Would I be good and get dressed? When I entered the dining-room it was nine-thirty. The performance, I was told, would begin at ten. We had just time to have a bite. But nothing was ready. Everyone kept shouting at the cook. At a quarter to ten my friend, who found the delay unbearable, said to me: "We shall be late. I think we had better skip the meal. What do you think?" A nice question to ask a guest! I was hungry as hungry could be. Still, not to disappoint her, I said: "As you please, dear."

So we went to the theatre without any food. I was in no frame of mind to enjoy the play. In any case, I could not have understood it, for it was in polished Urdu. I was almost fainting with hunger when we returned home in the small hours of the morning. Indian performances are interminable affairs. However, I thought I should get something to eat. No, nothing. I could not sleep. I was far too hungry. I must have something to eat. I rose, put on my gown, and tip-toed down, not to awaken my host. The kitchen, the kitchen, I was looking for the kitchen! After groping in the dark, I found it at last. I turned on the light and looked round. I saw nothing to which I could help myself. I searched the cupboard. I discovered three tomatoes. With what joy I fell on these! I returned to my room. My hunger was by no means appeased, but I was feeling better. Soon I fell asleep, dreaming of some French dish.

The second day was an exact copy of the first. As my visit was drawing to a close, I said nothing, but I vowed within myself that if ever I accepted the invitation of an Indian friend I would take enough provisions with me to last a siege. I had again to steal three tomatoes. There were no more. As I climbed into the train, my friend, who had come to see me off, said laughingly: "Do you know what the cook has been saying? She thinks that a thief has been coming into the house and stealing tomatoes. Fancy stealing tomatoes!"

"Did she recognise the thief?"

"No. But she thought it was a spirit. The poor woman was so scared that she dared not approach. Do you think she was telling the truth?"

"Who knows, my dear, who knows? Very probably the good woman did see something."

Here our talk was interrupted because it was time for my friend to leave. A blast, and the train slowly pulled out of the station.

At the very next stop I ordered a copious luncheon. I don't think I have ever enjoyed a meal so much.

RAMAKRISHNA MISSION PRESIDENT IN BOMBAY.

His Holiness Swami Virajanandaji, President of the Ramakrishna Math and Mission, is on a visit to Bombay this month. Inspired by the life and teachings of Sri Ramakrishna, Swami Virajananda renounced the world and joined the Ramakrishna Order in 1891, at the age of 17. He had the rare privilege of living with most of the direct disciples of the Master, and profiting by their life of intense spiritual practices. After Swami Vivekananda's return from the West in 1897, Swami Virajananda was initiated into 'sanyasa' and was sent to Eastern Bengal on a preaching tour. During the next few years he was in different parts of Northern India, particularly at the Advaita Ashrama, Mayavati, District Almora. He was made a trustee of the Belur Math in 1906, and that very year he was put in charge of the Mayavati Ashrama on the demise of its President Swami Swarupananda. He successfully held this Office till 1913, and in addition was the editor of the Prabudha Bharata the English monthly organ of the Order. During his regime the early volumes of the complete works and the life of Swami Vivekananda were published. The next year he founded, in the Almora district, a beautiful Retreat, called the Vivekananda Ashrama, at Shyamala Tal, where he passed many years in meditation amid the quiet and sublimity of the Himalayan forest. Since 1926 he has been actively in touch with the work of the Headquarters of the Ramakrishna Math and Mission, of which he was elected Secretary in 1934 and Vice-President in May 1938 and President in October the same year.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, t is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Mysore Constitutional Reform :—The scheme of Mysore constitutional reform includes enlargement of the Legislative Council and the Representative Assembly both as regards their constitution and functions, and the nomination of two elected members to membership of the Executive Council of the State. The two members so nominated, however, will be responsible to His Highness the Maharaja and not to the Legislature, that is to say, they will not be removable from office on an adverse vote in the Legislature. The arrangement can not be dismissed as unworkable but its successful working will depend on the existence of a cordial spirit of co-operation between the Government and the Legislature, unattainable under a Party system. The franchise has been lowered and the number of voters to the Assembly will be nearly twice as many as at present. Separate electorates have been assigned to Muslims at their request. This is but just. But, as we pointed out recently, this would be an effective barrier in the way of the minority, by ability and force of character, acquiring an effective influence in directing the course of policy. The Muslims may come to realise this by experience. The vicious principle of weightage has been adopted, though only to a small extent, but even with weightage, Muslims will still be a minority. The fact that they have been given a weightage can not but detract from the sense of responsibility of the more broad-minded section of the majority for the well-being of the whole population including the minority. Whatever may be the uses of weightages in British India, in Mysore where the Maharaja remains the balance-wheel controlling the whole machinery, they are unlikely to be anything better than an encumbrance. The outside world will judge the new constitution by the high standard set by the one which it supplants. Mysore has been fortunate in enjoying continuity of administration for over two generations. Much credit is due to the able administrators who served the Maharajas as Dewans during this period. Even more credit is due to the rulers themselves for trusting them, and according them their full support while they were in office. In all but name Mysore has in these respects been a constitutional monarchy. If the politically-minded people of Mysore appreciate this fact and work the new constitution with an earnest desire to maintain this continuity, the future of the State will surely be even more progressive and be fraught with great blessings to its people and be, moreover, an object-lesson to the whole country.

The Peace Move :—The endeavour of the Queen of Holland and the King of Belgium to persuade the belligerents in the present War to agree to have their claims against each other settled by means of negotiation, has not led to any change in the situation. The British Sovereign and the French President have sent separate replies to their Majesties. Herr Hitler's reply is a polite refusal to negotiate for Peace since the replies of the British and French Governments advanced terms which Germany can not even discuss, much less accept. The British reply does not specify any terms. It repeats generally the formula of Mr. Chamberlain, namely, that the aim of the Allies is "to secure that Europe is redeemed from the perpetually recurring fear of German aggression, to enable the peoples of Europe to preserve their independence, and liberties and to prevent the resort to force instead of pacific means for the settlement of international disputes." This is exactly what the two Sovereigns who have most reason to make sure of their independence, invited the belligerents to do. The British reply, therefore, amounts to a refusal to negotiate with the present German Government. More specifically the French President insists that reparation should be made for the injustice done to Austria, Czechoslovakia and Poland. If he means that these countries must be restored to their pre-Munich status, it would mean that not only the evacuation of the parts of Poland now permanently incorporated in Soviet Russia but also the surrender of the Sudeten district of Czechoslovakia annexed by Germany with the consent of the British and French Governments. An International tribunal is the most suitable agency for the adjudication of these and other questions which are likely to arise out of them. King George prefaces his reply by mentioning that the Dominions of Australia, Canada, New Zealand and South Africa have been consulted and that his reply embodies their views as well as that of the British Government. Eire is omitted from the list, because she has declared her neutrality in this war. India is omitted because she has no independent status in the Commonwealth.

Personalities in History:—In an article which is given the leading place in the current Political Quarterly, Mr. Leonard Woolf urges that the political problems of Europe are not, as popularly supposed, the outcome of the acts of individuals but of forces of which the individual is a symptom and a symbol. Mr. Woolf observes:

> If there is one certain fact about the determination of historical events in the past, it is that the individuals who at first sight appear to be the ultimate causes, in reality played a very minor role. A Napoleon and a Hitler, even a Pericles and an Augustus, were the puppets or symbols of deep social forces. If you want to know why things happened or why they did not happen, you must investigate not the individuals, but these forces which jerked their arms and legs and minds one way or another.

This is a new version of the old theory that the great man is the son of his time and not its father and progenitor. Against this, we have the theory that history is largely the biography of great men. While it is certainly true that the great man does not come like a bolt from the blue but is moulded out of the circumstances of his time and environment, it is at the same time difficult to deny that he has a definite influence in directing the minds of his contemporaries and thus moulding the shape of things to come. In India hero-worship is fostered by the religious doctrine of avatars. Every man of some distinction in any walk of life, more especially in religion or what resembles religion, runs the risk of being dubbed an Avatar and relegated to the national pantheon. What is more, he himself is liable to develop the notion that he represents the Divine Being. Here, therefore, we have to be on guard against being imposed by the belief in history as the expression of personal factors. But it is idle to deny that great personalities do shape the course of history if only to give it a bent or bias towards one rather than towards another ideal. In India, for example, Gandhiji's influence in popularising the ideal of non-violence has been very great. It may not be lasting and may give way to some other personal influence. That is another question.

Freedom and Totalitarianism:—Mr. J. M. Ganguli in his article on "Democracy and Dictatorship" which we publish this week, warns readers not be led away by phrases. It is apparent that familiarity with the operation of democracy has turned him away from the theory of democracy. On the other hand, the social and economic achievements of totalitarianism—it is clear he means just this by "dictatorship"—have compelled him to ask whether after all there is not a redeeming feature to Nazism. It is interesting to note that Gandhiji's Harijan is following a similar trend of thought in a series of articles headed rather apologetically "Even Hitler may teach." It is rather unfortunate that the realisation should have come at a time when the chances of the democracies "learning" from Herr Hitler are very remote. An earlier and wider recognition of this might have averted the present war. When Mr. Ganguli argues that there is not much to choose in the actual working of Governments, whether democratic or Fascist, and that, therefore, the acid test is in the immediate results in economic and social amelioration, he ignores the subtle influence of the declared principles of a government on its policies. The reason why democracy and dictatorship shade into each other is largely because neither totalitarianism nor democracy is complete in itself. All government involves some coercion. The fact that it has to be exercised over men and women by men and women necessarily implies that the coercion can not be complete at any time. Even the most democratic administration has to employ repressive measures at times. All totalitarian regimes claim to rest on the will of their peoples. The democratic imperialisms occupy a peculiar position: They exercise absolute power over their colonial possessions, but it has been subject to a certain responsibility to opinion in their own countries or, after the experiment of the mandates system, to the League of Nations. Where the conflict between their autocratic regime and the wishes of the people was too glaring, they always urged the greater interests of the races they ruled over, sometimes even calling it "educating the subject peoples to democracy." These factors are calculated to confuse the issues and to blur all distinctions. It is only when we turn from systems to the individual that we can appreciate the basic difference between Totalitarianism and Democracy. That the ideals of Democracy have been but imperfectly achieved is no argument for their abandonment.

India and War News:—The paucity of war news and the fact that the House of Commons has so far twice discussed the subject of censorship of Indian news, are likely to create the impression that much more news is available in Britain than there is out here. The last mails from Britain have brought us the journals issued early in October and so far as we can make out they have nothing new to give by way of information. What is remarkable, however, in the great freedom allowed to writers in Britain to express all shades of opinion on the war with Germany. There could have been no better argument for the democratic system. In the first discussion on the censorship on cables sent to India, it was clear that the reference was more to the expression of certain views than to the publication of news. Now the Under-Secretary for India explained that it might be advisable to adopt a different policy in India even as regards news, to what is followed in Britain. It is obvious that the censoring must relate to messages which are of special interest to India and not, as the debate on November 9 indicated, to criticism of the conduct of neutral countries. It is difficult otherwise to see why the publication of news released freely in Britain should be indiscreet in India.

Sir Frank Noyce's Advice :—Sir Frank Noyce is an able and distinguished retired member of the Indian Civil Service. This unfortunately is not a qualification for any one who undertakes to advise India on her national aims and aspirations. The Indian Civil Service man is by his interests, training and habits precluded almost physically from regarding the Indian except as a person destined to remain perpetually under the benevolent protection of the British bureaucracy composed of men like himself. He is unable, like most Englishmen who have interests in India, to imagine that the Indian may have the same ambitions and aspirations as the Englishman and the Scotsman. Although British economic and industrial policy in this country has been notoriously self-interested, the retired Englishman is ever proclaiming the duty of Indians to place above everything else the economic advantage of this country. Reuter sent us this week a summary of an address which Sir Frank delivered at the East India Association in London. We have seldom come across a more muddled summary of what was presumably an interesting address by an exceptionally able administrator. We are told Sir Frank thought that modern India was faced with the same problems and temptations as Germany (of all countries). One day Lord Samuel tells the world that Hinduism and Hitlerism are as poles asunder. The next day, an experienced Englishman who has spent the best part of his life in the Indian Civil Service tells us that we are beset by the same temptation as Herr Hitler, implying that we are likely to succumb to it like Herr Hitler. Now, what are Germany's temptations? She wants to be a world power like Great Britain and France. Do Indians have any such aspiration? Herr Hitler wants colonies in Africa. Indians, on the other hand, have to struggle everyday of their lives to maintain their position as law-abiding citizens who only wish to be allowed to make their living in that Continent. Sir Frank also compared us to Russia. In his opinion these two countries are foolish in spending a large part of their wealth on military preparations, which they might save if they attached themselves presumably to the British Commonwealth or the United of America. "If," he said, "she (India) elects to stand alone, she will, like Germany and Russia, dissipate an increasing margin of her wealth brought about by technical progress, in directions of singularly little value to a great majority of her citizens." India does not aspire to be a military power. She has no quarrel with any Power and does not intend to have one hereafter. As a nation, she has always been devoted to peace and she is greatly vexed when without any excuse on her part she is required to develop a war mentality. But is not Great Britain also using up a large part of her wealth on objects which are of no benefit but of great risk to a great majority of her citizens?

Indians in Natal :—A Reuter's telegram from Johannesburg says :—

> The executive committee of the new Natal Indian Association recently formed by amalgamation of the Natal Colonial-Born and Settlers Indian Association has adopted as a resolution that, while opposed to segregation or separation of races, it is prepared, with a view to establishing more cordial relations between European and Indian communities, to do everything in its power to prevent purchase of any property by Indians in any predominantly European residential area.
> The resolution, subject to confirmation by the general meeting of the Association, also accepted the Minister of Interior's suggestion to appoint a sub-committee to work in co-operation with the housing committee of the Durban City Council. The Association believes that this step will enable the City Council to obtain an insight into the housing needs and difficulties of the Indian community and ultimately result in a satisfactory solution of the problem of penetration without recourse to legislation.

We welcome this arrangement which, if carried out in the friendly spirit by which it is inspired, should ensure the provision to Indians of the same amenities in their residential areas as are enjoyed by Europeans in theirs. Otherwise, it will be of no good either to the Indians or the Whites. The great thing is to guard against the creation of slums which ghettos invariably tend to become. It is natural for people of one community or class to prefer to live amidst others of the same class.

The Constituent Assembly :—The late Prime Minister of Madras, Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya in a speech in Madras, sought to remove some misconceptions regarding the Constituent Assembly which the Congress wants to be called to frame a constitution for India. He said that it was not intended that the Assembly should be composed only of representatives of the Congress and the Moslem League. It would, on the contrary, include all parties, interests and communities. Just how this is to be done is the first and greatest problem in convening such an Assembly. Mr. Rajagopalacharya seems to have some sort of election by popular electorates in view. But popular electorates are not expected to be versed in constitutional principles and machinery. They will elect more or less the same representatives as they returned to the Legislatures. Mr. Rajagopala's faith in popular bodies varies with their attitude to his party. If they support it, they are the voice of the people and the voice of God. If they oppose him, as in respect of compulsory Hindi in middle schools, they are riff-raff and may be repressed with all the powers of the old bureaucracy. This comes out clearly in his objection to the States being represented in the Constituent Assembly. They represent, he says, only Governments and not the people, as if there can be a people without a Government.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, November 18, 1939.

FROM REPUBLIC TO DICTATORSHIP.

The emergence of military dictatorships in Europe from the chaos and confusion left behind by the last War, is not, as is commonly thought, a new or strange phenomenon. The Roman Republic which at its best was a model of integrity, was succeeded by a military dictatorship just as ruthless as the dictatorships in Europe. The transition from Republic to dictatorship in Rome did not come suddenly. It covered nearly two centuries. While historians have given us glimpses of the transition period, there has not been any systematic study so far of the steps by which the transition took place. We are indebted to the Illinois University in its famous series of Studies in the Social Sciences for supplying this omission. The latest volume in the series, entitled "Mob Violence in the late Roman Republic, 133-49 B. C.," maintains the high standard of the Studies. It is fully documented as all these Studies are. In his brief Preface, the author of this monograph, Professor John Wesley Heaton, notes that many of the problems are obviously parallel to situations which are troubling our own modern life, and among these are the rise of a class of gangsters and the increasing frequency of mob violence. He sums up the main originating factors of the period in a weighty paragraph. He writes—

> This development is part of the larger story of how the Roman city state expanded into a world empire and of the political, social and economic problems which resulted. Although embracing practically all the peoples of the Mediterranean area, the government had been unable to adapt itself to changing conditions and continued to struggle along under an outmoded constitution. Many were demanding political representation and equality; others wanted work and the sustenance of life, amid the general plenty; still others fought against class distinctions and the bondage of slavery. All these demands are represented in the violent disorders which occurred in the State from the time of the Gracchi to the beginning of the empire.

In his first chapter, Professor Heaton traces the origin and growth of the Roman proletariat which was the chief factor in undermining the pure republican spirit of the Romans and eventually of the destruction of the Republic. The stages by which the Roman small farmers of the early Republic noted for their piety, dutifulness, and patriotism, were transformed into the "plebs urbana" of the first century, who centred their ambitions on "panem et circenses" are described in the first chapter which furnishes the background of the whole Study.

Wars played a great part in the demoralisation of Roman society. After the Punic Wars, Professor Heaton observes, owing chiefly to the acquisition of the riches of the Mediterranean lands, there came a precipitate change in Roman life, similar to that experienced by many modern nations following the World War. The introduction of wealth and a luxurious mode of living, exercised a great influence upon the development of the proletariat. But, as Professor Heaton, the masses shared to greater degree in this material improvement really were worse off than before because of consequent increase in urban costs. In other words, there was considerable unemployment which was aggravated by the existence of the institution of slavery. The Wars took a heavy toll of citizens. Their place had to be filled by slaves for whom there grew up a steadily increasing demand from employers. More than 10,000 slaves were sold in a single day in Delos, the chief emporium of the trade. Slaves were allowed to marry and multiply and were thus a source of great gain to the large landowners. In fact, it was no unusual thing for slaves to be bred for the market from selected slaves much like cattle. Gladiators served as stud bulls and were paid for the service. The doctrine of race purity was not a modern invention. Among the causes of the decline of the republican spirit in Rome historians have given a prominent place to the influx of aliens and their intermixture with the citizens. To meet the problem of unemployment grain doles were regularly given to the people which led to large numbers from the country side pouring into Rome and swelling the ranks of the proletariat. The following profound observation may be well pondered over by the student of current politics in many countries including our own :

> Another cause of the degradation of the proletariat lay in the quality of its leadership, for it may be taken as axiomatic that popular groups tend to correspond to the type of men who command them. As Cicero says, the character of prominent individuals is usually reproduced in the whole state.

It is not the purpose of a study like the present to indicate how the problems of the Romans should or could have been better solved with the knowledge and resources at their disposal. But it is clear that in Professor Heaton's opinion a more discriminate extension of the Roman franchise might have averted some of the worst incidents of the transition period.

> The election practices of the day served to exaggerate the importance of the proletariat and to degrade further the lower elements. The small shopkeepers and workmen, clients and dependents, the loafers and beggers, were the objects of special attention in order to attract their votes.

We may conclude this short and cursory notice of an important contribution to social and historical studies, with a passage in which Professor Heaton refers to the influx of Oriental religious ideas as a cause of the demoralisation of the Roman people :

> An additional factor in the degradation of the masses was the decay of the old Roman religion and the entry of Oriental mystic conceptions and practices. The old state rites became more and more a political figment especially following the Aelian and Fufian laws of about 150 B. C., and were used by the nobility for invalidating the wishes of the people. On the other hand, Oriental religions were coming into Rome in the second and first centuries being disseminated by the Eastern slaves and by many Romans who had been in contact with the East. These religions made great emotional appeal to the multitude through their orgiastic rites and colourful processions. While the conservative nobility tried at various times to stop their progress, yet these influences, especially among the masses, increaed by leaps and bounds. Among others, the cults of Magna Mater, Bellona, Isis and Osiris, Jewry, astronomy and astrology, all had their devoted followers.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

MR. JINNAH ON ISLAM.

When it was announced two days ago that Mr. Jinnah, President of the Muslim League, had kindly consented to broadcast from the Bombay station, without the subject being mentioned, one's first feeling was that the Director of the Bombay Station was initiating a departure from established precedent, which was bound to lead to controversy. That Monday on which Mr. Jinnah was to broadcast was Id day and that his observations would have reference to the religious significance of the festival, did not, though obvious, suggest itself. Mr. Jinnah has not been known to be interested in anything outside his profession and politics. Latterly his political activities had thrown even his professional life in the shade. Not only was Mr. Jinnah not known to be particularly interested in religion. He was even thought to be indifferent to it. But appearances in such matters are nearly always deceptive. Profoundly religious men do not parade their religion. Mr. Jinnah, it is clear, belongs to this class. His broadcast was really a sermon on Islam. It showed that Mr. Jinnah was deeply versed in and had pondered on the things of the spirit. His statement of the essence of Islam. his emphasis on its tolerance and charity, and his incidental exposition of the bearing of these qualities on the duty of Indian Muslims to their country and their non-Muslim countrymen, were inspired by a lofty idealism. It was a sermon which, with a few verbal alterations, might have been pronounced from a Hindu mandir or a Christian pulpit. In their higher reaches all great religions proclaim the same truths. There is a beautiful story in illustration of the harmony of religious experience. A Muslim Fakir came to a city where a Hindu Sadhu had pitched his tent. The Sadhu to intimate to the Fakir that he was already in possession sent the latter by a chela a bowl brimful of milk. The Fakir, no doubt a Persian versed in the lore of flowers, returned the milk with a few rose petals floating on the top, implying that his presence would affect the Sadhu as little as would the rose petals, the weight or volume of the milk. If all religious leaders were men of religious experience and not merely practitioners who had learnt their theology second and third hand, there would be no dissensions on account of religion. Religion would then be the greatest harmonising factor in the world.

Mr. Jinnah interpreted Islam to mean Action. We have always understood it to mean surrender to the Will of God. Pickthall in his English translation of the Koran adopts this sense. There is, of course, a sense in which the distinction between action and inaction ceases to exist. The most intense activity seems to onlookers like complete inactivity. A top at the height of its spin is a fine illustration. Tennyson's lines of the tide which moving seems asleep too full for sound or foam is another. A modern economic-minded young man reproached for doing nothing a Sadhu whom he saw sitting day after day motionless in the temple precints. The Sadhu replied by requesting the economist to still sit by his side for a while. The young man found it difficult to remain in one posture for more than a few minutes. After about ten or fifteen minutes he gave up trying and confessed to the Sadhu that, though economically unremunerative, to sit still was no easy job. You can not be still unless your mind is concentrated. And concentration of mind is the most intense form of human activity. And concentration is possible only as an act of Surrender. Therefore, Islam as Surrender to the will of God is also Islam as Action. But to the ordinary man, Action means a displacement of one thing by another or from one place to another—a movement in space. Action is very difficult to define. But the chief objection to accepting Action as a religious principle is that all action is liable to reaction. How to perform Action without its leading to Reactions inconsistent with the purpose of the Action, is the great problem of Mechanics as well as of Religion. The qualities which make a good Mussulman as defined by the Prophet of Arabia are precisely the same as those which other religions demand of their votaries. Subjectively, the requirements of a good Hindu, Muslim, Buddhist, Christian or Zoroastrian are identical. Mr. Jinnah in his sermon said that at the root of all forms of activity there should be religious enlightenment in order to make them productive of good to humanity. This is a sound principle and we welcome it as coming from the President of the Muslim League.

RETHINKING CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA.*

The last two words in the title of this volume of Essays by seven earnest and thoughtful Indian Christians restrict the Rethinking of Christianity to the situation in this country. But the great fact about Christianity today is its rejection, avowed or tacit, by the nations of Europe and America which have professed it for a thousand years and have sent missionaries to non-Christian lands to convert their peoples to the several sects prevalent in them. For the last one hundred years Christianity in non-Christian countries has been identified with European civilisation with its predominantly commercial and political outlook. Livingstone had to hold out the prospect of extending the market for Manchester cloth in order to interest the British Government in his mission to Africa. Christian Missions nowadays are a part of the paraphernalia of that curious compound, democratic Imperialism. Even countries like France and Portugal which are anti-clerical at home, maintain missionaries in Asia, Africa and Oceania. It is obvious, therefore, that Christianity will today stand at the bar of history side by side with the political and economic nationalism of Europe and America, unless it boldly assumes the role of accuser itself. This should properly be undertaken by some eminent representative of European Christianity. His Holiness the Pope occasionally issues a non-committal encyclical deploring the murder of Peace in the name of Civilisation. The Archbishop of Canterbury does not do this even. His Grace has on the other hand adopted and proclaimed the doctrine that force must be met by force. In India foreign missionaries continue to magnify the mote in Hindu eyes totally unmindful of the beam in the eyes of Westernism. In default of an European or American John Knox to denounce the failure of Christianity in Europe, it is incumbent on Indian Christians to take the unpleasant duty on themselves. Their omission to do so is a disappointing feature of "Re-thinking Christianity." The fact that all the contributors to this volume are South Indians, is significant. Only in South India is there a real and earnest endeavour to treat Christianity as a spiritual asset. In Northern India, Indian Christians are quarrelling with Missonaries over the possession of Church property which apparently they value most. There is no mistaking the zeal, the earnestness and the enthusiasm of the contributors to this volume in their endeavour to link up Christianity with India's religious tradition. It is not difficult to do so if you approach the task from the right angle. But their way of approach is bound to multiply difficulties. As a Hindu, one can accept any religious teacher or teaching without a qualm of conscience. As a Christian, as the term is commonly understood, you cannot do so. There is nothing in any of these papers which a Hindu writer could not have written. In fact, the standpoint of these writers is essentially Hindu. And yet one is surprised to read the statement of Mr. Job—the only writer with a non-Hindu name in the galaxy—that Swami Vivekananda's teaching that one can be a good Christian and a good Muslim as well as a good Hindu in the scheme of the Vedanta, rests on a confusion of thought. Mr. Job's belief that there was at any time a fear that Christianity is the only serious rival to Hinduism, might have been true of the early years of the last century. Raja Ram Mohan Roy certainly felt so and exerted his powerful influence to stop the tide of conversion which had set in. And he succeeded. The founding of the Brahmo Samaj effectively choked up the stream of proselytes from among caste Hindus. Today Christianity is not thought of as a serious competitor. Its failure in Europe has deprived it of its prestige as a religion and as the road to material prosperity and political predominance. The Hindu-Muslim controversy has further sidetracked the Hindu-Christian rivalry, so much so that a friend remarked some time back that if, as proposed by Dr. Ambedkar, the scheduled castes should change their religion, he would rather that they became Christians than Muslims.

THE RUSSIAN SPHINX.

(By a Reader).

If it is not impertinent I should like to congratulate The Reformer on its note on M. Molotov's speech. It is in striking contrast to the opinion expressed by most papers in India regarding the Soviet betrayal of Poland and its subsequent waving of the big stick in regard to the Baltic States. If M. Molotov means by a free hand in international affairs that Russia has decided to become master of all it surveyed, then advocates of the "New Order," among whom may be included India, with its detached outlook on world affairs, should call a spade a spade and courageously face the issue being raised by the Soviet's relapse into dynamic politics.

During the five years which have elapsed since Russia's entry into the League of Nations—the reported move to get out of it is quite consistent with its change of front—the spokesmen of that country earned such a name for balanced thinking by manly protests against any form of oppression of small nations, that one thought that the march to the democratic fold would be sure and steady. Two years ago, Prof. Barker pointed out in the course of a remarkable paper on ideologies: "Communist Russia now seeks to take her place by the side of the Liberal-Democratic States in defending the cause of a static ideology in international affairs. Perhaps the new company which she is seeking to keep has been the great factor which has tended of late to draw Russia, even in the sphere of her own internal life, towards a formal approximation to the general democratic system of ideas." The political orphan was thus admitted into the League after a good deal of hesitation, but Russia showed by its conduct that it was safe and sound as far as international affairs were concerned. Even before that, Russia had qualified for admission by its declaration at the Disarmament Conference in favour of general and complete disarmament, though, of course, it received short shrift. As a matter of fact, its fanciful intention had even earlier been proclaimed to the world in the Treaty of 1929, to which Poland and Russia, among others, were parties, of the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy; and in 1934 it had agreed to such a meticulous definition of aggression that, to an impartial mind, not versed in the intricate, involved and capricious logic of totalitarian minds, the march into Poland on the 17th September in the year of grace 1939, appears to be a cynically brutal violation of that principle in every particular. As late as September of last year, the Foreign Commissar of U. S. S. R., Comrade Litvinoff, who has gone the way of those who dared to oppose Stalin, stated in the League that Russia was ready to fulfil her obligation with France to Czechoslovakia in the event of an unprovoked aggression. It is unnecessary to speculate whether, if Mr. Chamberlain had not been inspired with the thought of appeasing Her Hitler Russia would have fulfilled her obligations. Probably she would have. As regards the Abyssinian affair, the U. S. S. R. had earlier protested against Italian action.

In the face of these soul-satisfying declarations, why did Russia invade Poland; why has it loyally adopted the tactics and technique of Germany; and why has it threatened the three Baltic States of Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia into submission, the three latter being forced to receive 75,000 Russian soldiers; and why is Finland being coerced? India's opinion generally adverse to Mr. Chamberlain's handling of the international situation, denounced him for not taking Russia into consultation as regards the crisis of September 1938. The sequel, however, would appear to justify, to some extent, the British Premier's suspicions of Russia and his long-drawn out negotiations with that country for a pact of mutual assistance in case of an unprovoked aggression against Poland and Rumania.

A probable explanation is that the heart of the Soviet Republic had not changed, though its intellect gained mastery for some time. It must have been all along hugging the view that treaties are there to be broken and that the only thing that mattered was self-interest, enlightened or disinterested or otherwise. Great Britain has not been free from this taint; far from it. There has been a serious decline in British moral standards, as Sir Alfred Zimmern has pointed out. For what else is the case of Ethiopia? And since Sir Alfred spoke, there have been other instances—Czechoslovakia, Albania, Austria. But one must admit that there is considerable force in what Sir Alfred says, "For many generations past humanitarian considerations have never been entirely absent from British policy.....of how many other European Powers, great and small, could that be said?" In 1830 Russian took away the constitution it had granted to Poland because, forsooth, the Polish rebellion justified that step. Only a thin dividing line there is between autocracy and dictatorship and Stalin has followed this example by invading Poland and annexing a third of it because Poland had been unsuccessful in resisting German onslaught, thereby threatening the very existence of her blood-brothers, the White-Russian and the Ukrainian! If she was peacefully inclined, could she not have assisted Poland, or at any rate, asked Germany to try the method of negotiation? Three years ago Bertrand Russell wrote: "There is no impossibility in an alliance between Germany and Russia leading to a new partition of Poland.....Everything possible is being done by Stalin to show that no question of principle divides him from Hitler, and I cannot doubt that he would be glad if the differences between the two countries could be composed at the expense of the traditional victim." A prophecy, not inferred from the conjunction of stars and planets, but made by a severely critical and intellectual judgment of national trends and it has come true! The fact is Soviet foreign policy which appeared at one time to have changed, has really not undergone any transformation. Two outstanding facts have to be remembered in this connection. One is that though the ideologies of Nazis and Communists differ in some important respects, they agree in a great many others. As Mr. Frank Newnes pointed out in a recent issue of The Times, the similarities extend to (1) dictatorship, (2) controlled press, (3) formidable secret police, (4) horrible concentration camps, (5) compulsory service, (6) persecution of hated people—Jews in one case and the higher classes in the other, (7) farcical elections. Other points may be mentioned, but these are the more important, and the two countries, unburdened by any lofty principles of State action and quite indifferent to world appraisement, adopt such tactics, methods and expedients as suit them or their leaders, or their prestige at the moment. And both are under Sphinxes whose intentions are not known and whose actions are unknowable except when they act. Of Stalin, S. Domitrievsky said (according to Stephen Graham): "Calm and immobile sits Stalin, with the stone face of a large historic dragon, in which alone the eyes are living. His thoughts, wishes, plans, crowd upon his mind..... He knows all that is happening in the spaces of immense Russia. But nothing agitates him. He has no doubts." No one knows his mind: He is a Sphinx.

M. Molotov, Stalin's "shadow," as he has been called, has, as The Reformer very correctly pointed out, very plainly hinted that Russia would not hesitate to go to war with the Allies if any attempt were made to revive that unwanted child, the Versailles Treaty. And yet is it not the duty of the Allies to restore the portion of Poland which Russia has now filched? In the name of all that is fair and just what does this callous remark mean? One understands the danger of alienating Russia: there is Germany to fight against, the Suez to guard and India to save. And India quite appreciates the necessity to guard against Russian aggression but all that does not hide the hideous reality of Russian help to Germany—materials, food and, if the "shadow's" veiled reference is true, man power tomorrow. Germany, Mussolini and General Hertzog ask why, if the Allies are waging an ideological war and desire, in pursuance thereof, to restore Poland, they have not declared war against Russia. The charge is mischievious, devilish and all that. But has it not some foundation? Why, in the name of commonsense should we ignore this aspect? War has its surprises and anything may happen. But we, who are for the enthronement of truth and justice in the direction of the affairs of the world, should look facts in the face and not bury our heads, like the ostrich, in the sand, as the Allied statesmen are doing.

DEMOCRACY AND DICTATORSHIP.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

The words democracy and dictatorship have been much in the press and on the lips of persons of late. The political regimes in some of the European States which have been augmenting and strengthening their national forces with a view to share more advantageously than at present the political, economic and territorial rights, privileges and possessions of the world with those who have them now, have been denounced as high-handed and irresponsible dictatorships, and have been adversely contrasted with their own governments by the latter powers, who want to keep their possessions and advantages undisturbed. These powers have eulogised their own systems of government as democratic, which, in its commonly understood significance, implies representative of the will of people, whereas the dictatorships, they point out, are subversive of the same. In as much as a single man's personality has a more or less dominating influence in a dictatorship, it can well be said that its acts and doings do not truly reflect the mind of the people; but, then, in the case of a democracy also it can be urged that it is controlled, if not by a single person, by a small group forming the government. If it be bad system for one man to run a country's policy and administration, it cannot be better for a small group in a country of millions of men to do the same. There is little real difference between the two. The point is only to what extent the ruling man or the ruling group is in possession of public respect and confidence, and how far its conduct of State affairs receives people's approbation. In this respect what a democracy may have to say in its favour can easily be repeated by a dictatorship with no less plausibility. If the will and support of people are said to be the sanction behind a democracy, a dictator can also point to the same behind him; for, as a democracy endures on the sufferance of people, a dictatorship has likewise to depend on it. Both Hitler and Mussolini, for instance, can well assert that they command much greater public support than, say the present British or French governments., for, if the people of those countries be asked to vote for or against their respective governments, surely a much greater percentage would vote for Hitler and Mussolini than for the French or British Governments.

As regards the question of responsibility to their people, the German and Italian dictators are responsible to their parliaments, where they enjoy majority support, as the French and British ministries are to their parliaments, where they have majority backing. If the dictators have been invested with greater discretionary powers than the other governments, that rather shows the greater confidence, which they have of their parliaments and of the people whom those parliaments represent.

Moreover, against the claim of the democratic governments of their responsibility to the people, the dictators can very pertinently refer to the complete absence of such responsibility in the imperial possessions of the democratic states. Millions of people in these possessions are ruled by governments, which constitutionally do not owe any responsibility to them, but only to their distant home governments; such utter irresponsibility is not merely a glaring inconsistency, but it completely removes the ground, on which imperial goverments can take their stand for making protestations of even the essential principles of democracy.

Not to give in, the democracies will perhaps submit that they came to power constitutionally through proper elections. But, unlike the days of Cromwell, in these days, dictators, like, say Hitler or Stalin, have also come through elective organisations, with one remarkable difference that whereas the democratic governments can only count on more or less working popular support in their countries and in their parliaments, the dictators confidently ride on overwhelming public and parliamentary popularity.

These facts and considerations come to mind when one sits down to judge deeply and dispassionately the merits and demerits of the one form of government against the other. There appears little to choose between the two. When looking at the dark side of one, black spots in the other come to view. Constitutional defects or lack of justification of one counterpoise those of the other.

To compare them and appraise them rightly and correctly, therefore, there can be only one criterion, namely, that of their actual record of service and administration. So far as such record in their imperial and extra-territorial possessions is concerned, none of them can hold its head high in confidence of receiving the verdict of impartial critics of unselfish and benevolent service to subjugated people and countries, or can produce its hands unsoiled by the crime of their oppression and exploitation.

In their own countries, however, they show different results. While the democratic states have generally remained in restful and unthinking contentment, letting domestic things and tendencies take their own unguided course and only anxious to maintain the existing political status quo, the dictatorships have been up and doing, thinking out and effecting improvements, augmenting national strength and stimulating national confidence, and even discouraging tendencies which weaken and demoralise individuals and nations. Thus, in Italy and Germany, loose, immoral tendencies in modern European society have been discouraged, and settled married life has been given economic premium. Industrial life has been comparatively purified by Hitler's advice to women to return to their home life and domestic work, an advice which is very far-sighted from all points of view of social welfare. Women doing domestic work in the peaceful atmosphere of their home are not only physically and mentally better off than those labouring hard in the vicious environments of factories and workshops, but they become better mothers also and birth-givers of better children. Recently Hitler has asked the German women returning home from Holland to give up their Parisian modes and fashions, which are likely to create jealousy in others and also to lead to unwholesome competition and bitterness. Whatever some people, who without deep thinking, would decry the imposition of any restriction on individual liberty of thought and action may say, this shows much forethought in the German Dictator. Some or other restriction on private liberty is inevitable and is present in all society and in all states in the form of conventions and laws. You can not even for instance sing in a high pitch, if you feel inspired to sing in the dead of night for fear of being proceeded against in a law court the next morning by your neighbours for creating nuisance. If, therefore, you adopt in your home ways which may have an unhappy or corrupting influence on your neighbour's family, a well-intentioned state authority can not be said to be altogether with out moral justification if he were to ask you to give them up.

As a matter of fact, through the system of education in vogue at a time and other means of propaganda of current tastes and ideas, the free and uninfluenced growth of individuality is never possible, nor is it even sought; and the measure of such education and influence on it is also the extent of cramping restrictions on its natural development. Such restriction is, moreover, not necessarily bad. It is possible to direct one's mental growth towards higher idealism than that of merely making the best of one's animal existence. When such direction is undertaken by a well-intentioned and far-seeing person or organisation, as is done, for instance, or is rather the idea in schools, restrictions incidentally imposed on personal liberty need not be blindly criticised.

For such and other beneficial purposes a dictatorship is more suitable than a democracy. In democracy or group rule all the members of the government, or even its majority, can not be possessed of deep wisdom, or capable of deep thinking. One or two of them may be able to conceive high and foresee results, but the mass mind of the group will be unable to soar to their height and will, therefore, not allow latitude to their inspiration in actual practice. The only merit of a democracy is that though it cannot conceive and achieve great things, it can, at any rate, check the malevolent tendencies of individuals in governmental powers. Thus, it is essentially a system of safety arrangement against any rapid changes, either for good or for bad. Ordinarily such safety is very useful and even necessary, particularly in days, when people in high station of life and in possession of great powers are seldom found to keep their heads cool and subordinate their self-interests to public interests. In the days of Ramchandra, for instance, who exiled even his beloved and virtuous wife, Sita, for the sake of his subjects, and for safeguarding against any possibility of lapse of public morals, an absolute monarchism or dictatorship was the best in the interests of people; but, when kings forget their prime duty of devoting themselves to the service of their subjects, prior to all self-consideration, no doubt democracies must be preferred to absolutism. Yet, however, if people assuming the role of dictators be forthcoming, who can show a high and disinterested sense of duty, who are capable of high conceptions, who can lead men from bad to good tendencies, who can stimulate and organise beneficial national work, and who can inspire the people by the purity and nobility of their own character (it is not, of course, suggested here that the present European dictators are, at least in every way, such persons), they should be welcomed rather than denounced.

INDIAN MUSIC.

The Mela-Raga-Malika of Maha Vaidya-Natha-Sivan Edited by Pandit S. Subrahmaniya Sastri F. T. S. The Adyar Library. 1937. Price Rs. 2/-.

The Theosophical Publishing House, Adyar, Madras have done a great service to all music-lovers of India by bringing out the above publication. The book contains a very interesting biographical sketch of the celebrated musician who was also a deeply religious man. The explanatory notes and the notations used are lucid and can be followed by all who have a taste for music. The book will be particularly welcome to all lovers of classical Karnatic music enabling them to have an insight into some of the Apoorva Ragas, very few of which are now sung in ordinary concerts.

SOME POINTERS TOWARDS POLITICAL PEACE.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

The political landscape is changing so rapidly from day to day both in India and in Europe that views which are valid today when I write, might become quite irrelevant in the changed situation on the date when the article is published. I am writing immediately after reading the latest pronouncement in Parliament on war aims by Lord Halifax and on India's goal by Lord Zetland and the Under-Secretary. If these statements are considered by the Congress High Command to be such as to form a basis for Congress ministries to resume office or to enter into successful negotiations with the Viceroy for that purposes, and if subsequently the Congress and the Moslem League are unable to reach such a compromise as would ensure co-operation by both and by other important parties at the centre, there would be no need for clouding the issues through a further contribution and the Editor will naturally not publish it. Should the position be different, I trust that space will be found for it.

The British Cabinet is obviously anxious to come to terms with the Congress, but is unable to hand over the destinies of India to the decision of a Constituent Assembly summoned under the auspices of the Congress. The shaping of the Constituent Assembly has nowhere been explained in detail by anyone. All that the President said in his reply to the Viceroy was that "the Constituent Assembly which will frame India's Constitution will be formed on the widest possible franchise and by agreement in regard to communal representation." This is an exceedingly vague statement and amounts to a demand for a blank cheque which no Government in power could ever give; and it is surprising that men of undoubted intellectual preeminence should make such a vague demand. The points which have to be made explicit before action could be taken have been mentioned elsewhere. The most important of them naturally is the nature of the agreement with the minorities, especially between Hindus and Moslems. It is no use asserting that the British are siding with the minorities. The only relevant matter is that before the Congress could legitimately make this demand it should either have enlisted in its ranks the majority of Moslems, and depressed classes and also the Sikhs, or should state in advance the terms of agreements reached with those communities. To ask for a blank cheque without and before achieving either result amounts only to political manoeuvring, unless it be due to mental confusion. There is no honest and sincere way of getting over this conclusion. If there is, I hope some one will state it dispassionately and logically. As a matter of expediency, the important first step is either to enlist the vast mass of Moslems in the Congress ranks, or come to terms with the Moslem League. If this is achieved, the rest is easy. If it is not achieved, Gandhiji has himself said that civil disobedience would amount to civil war or criminal war. It is hoped that for the peaceful progress of India, this position would be clearly grasped and that all steps in the immediate future would be predominantly for that object.

I have suggested in various articles several methods for ensuring unity. They would be useful only if minority communities cease to use the problem as a bogey or stalking house for exercising power over the majority community, and would be satisfied if their religion and culture are protected, and if they get adequate representation in the public services. The essence of my idea, published long ago, is that they should be enabled to protect themselves in those respects instead of having to be protected by a foreign Power or through the favour of the majority community.

In this matter of the question of majority and minority communities, it is astonishing to find that a university Vice-chancellor, Mr. Kedar of Nagpur, should have given expression to the following opinion in the Assembly C. P. "According to constitutional law as was pointed out by Lord Samuel in the Commons Debate, it is the majority community who had a right to be consulted, and the minority had no locus standi. It was only after that form (of constitution) had been settled that the minorities could claim protection not from an alien authority, but from the majority community." He added that the aggression (against the government thus set up) whether Muslim or any other would be met by resistance and that so long as unity (between Hindus and Muslems) was made a condition precedent to the grant of Dominion Status, that unity would never be achieved.

This goes much further than the Congress demands. The Congress is open to all classes, and has a large number of Moslems in its ranks. Mr. Kedar wants the constitution to be settled by agreement between the British and the Hindu Community. Another member suggested that Hindus should be trained in arms, apparently in order to resist Mahomedan aggression.

No one would be more astounded than Lord Samuel to read these commentaries on his speech. He did not, of course, say or mean any such thing, although it has to be admitted that in his speech as reported in the Hindu the distinction between a Parliamentary majority, which he had in mind, and a communal majority which has no political majority rights but only rights, if any, of conquest, was not brought out clearly. There is nothing in international law, which is probably his meaning to substantiate the assertion. He had apparently in mind the question of the settlement of the rights of racial majorities and minorities within a newly formed political area like Czecho-Slovakia or Poland. There is no international constitutional law if that is what was meant, applying to races or communities who belong to the same local area and have lived there. This problem itself is one of the modern confusions which is dependent on the unscientific notion of racial purity and on the mistakes of the Versailles Treaty. It has nothing to do with communities having different religions but are of the same race like Hindus and Moslems in India. Except when racial minorities are newly added to political areas, there is no problem. Constitutions are settled by the people themselves without outside interference. There is no outsider in the picture who consults either the majority race or the minority race; and to conclude in case of new political amalgamations it is the League of Nations which had authority and which actually heard grievances of racial minorities and not the majority race. What the facts are that Mr. Kedar relies on, I do not know. Even the expression "Constitutional law" as applying to different states is new to me. I have understood international law to apply to relations between states and constitution and its laws to apply to a single state, so that the assertion that under constitutional law it is the majority community who have to be consulted (by whom, when and why) conveys no clear meaning to me. It looks like a blindman looking for a black cat which is not there, in a dark room. It is a pity that a vice-Chancellor who is the Head of Hindu and Moslem students should have said this. I have also held this office and it seems to me that this office should be kept entirely above party politics, especially communal politics. Hindu leaders will, I hope, repudiate Mr. Kedar's assertions, which are both incorrect and highly pernicious.

NOTES.

The Political Deadlock :—The talk between the Viceroy on the one side and the President of the Congress and Mr. Gandhi, and the President of the Muslim League, was known to have proved infructuous last Saturday. It was announced on Sunday that His Excellency the Viceroy would broadcast a message that evening. One expected that His Excellency would announce the failure of the negotiations and add that Government would nevertheless proceed to implement their promise to coopt non-official members to the Executive Council and to form a Consultative Assembly from non-Congress, non-Muslim League elements in the country. That there are such elements and that they constitute the greater part of the population needs no proof. But the Viceroy ended rather tamely by saying that he would not give up his attempt to bring the League and Congress together and the implementing of the promise was not mentioned at all. It is obvious that the Government do not want any other party or group to emerge from the present situation and the Kumara Raja of Chettinad was right when he declined to form an interim ministry in Madras in view of the negotiations which the Viceroy was carrying on with the Congress. The Viceroy's action in according interviews to the leaders of the two parties and trying to get them to patch up their differences certainly gave rise to the belief that, if the League and the Congress agreed upon a formula, Government would immediately proceed to enlarge the Executive Council and institute the Consultative Council which may form the basis of a future Constituent Assembly desired by the Congress and not, according to the latest information, objected to by Mr. Jinnah. The impression created by the Viceroy's talks with the Congress and League leaders, was so distinct that the leaders of the Hindu Mahasabha got alarmed and sent a message to His Excellency that the Hindus will not be bound by any arrangement come to without a consultation with, and the consent of, the Mahasabha representatives. It is, therefore, surprising that the Secretary of State for India should have thought fit to state early this week that the British Government have obligations which they must fulfil and could not disinterest itself in the future constitution of India leaving it to be decided by a Constituent Assembly called at the instance of the Congress and the League. Apparently the Viceroy and the Secretary of State are not acting together. Lord Zetland's statement sounded like a repudiation of the Viceroy's action in having talks with the leaders of two party organizations to the exclusions of others as well as non-party persons who form the bulk of the population. We have no faith in a Constituent Assembly ourselves. It will be difficult, almost impossible, to get together one which will represent the real living elements of Indian life as distinguished from the vociferous and gate-crashing elements. If one is formed there is no certainty that the issue will be discussed on their merits by persons who understand them and that the convention will not be hustled into a decision by some popular personage undertaking a fast unto death. The impossibility of entrusting the task to a Constituent Assembly, however, is no excuse for Government refraining from doing anything, much less to enter into negotiations which create misleading impressions.

Indians and Federation:—Lord Samuel in his illuminating review of the Indian political situation in the House of Lords, observed that during his recent visit to this country he found that, while all shades of opinion were critical of the Federal scheme of the Government of India Act, 1935, they were agreed that the federal form of government was a necessity in Indian conditions. This is correct with the proviso that some, we among others, regard Federation as a half-way house to unification which is the age-long goal of Indian history. The Federation scheme of 1935 is a Federation only in name. When Federation was first mooted at the Round Table Conference, few in Britain, as Sir Samuel Hoare confessed at a congratulatory banquet after the passing of the Act, knew anything about Federation. They had to rush about collecting available books on the subject. In an interesting paper on "World Order" which Mr. Lionel Curtis read before the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London last February, he remarked in a totally different connection: "In England my great difficulty has always been that people here have no practical experience of Federal government. They scarcely know what it means, as any one will realise who studies the decisions of the Privy Council on the constitutional questions of Canada." If such is the state of ignorance in Britain, it is still worse in India. The Princes who most enthusiastically sponsored Federation in India, knew least about it. Within the last two or three years, however, due mainly to the discussions provoked by Mr. Clarence Streit's widely-read book "Union Now," Federation has been studied and canvassed in numerous articles and papers. The one thing that has emerged in these discussions, is that it is the essence of Federation that the Federal Government, so far as Federal subjects are concerned, must have authority to enforce its orders on each individual citizen of the Federation directly and independently of the government of the State or Province of his domicile. In the Indian scheme, now happily suspended, the Federal Government and the Federal Court are deliberately left to depend on the discretion of the Crown Representative for the enforcement of the obligations incurred by federating States should any of them neglect or refuse to carry them out. Indian opinion is, therefore, on solid ground in refusing to accept this pseudo-Federation. It will decline to accept any other scheme under the name of Federation unless it fulfils the conditions which the experience of countries under Federal systems has shown to be indispensable to the smooth and efficient working of orderly government.

Hitlerism and Hinduism;—Another point in Lord Samuel's speech which calls for comment is his comparison and contrast between Hinduism and Hitlerism. He seems to think that Ahimsa is of universal application in Hinduism and that all Hindus are in consequence vegetarians and abstainers from violence. Hinduism knows only one Absolute and that is God. Everything else is relative. Relativity is, indeed, the key-note of Hindu psychology. What is sinful in an educated man, is innocent if done by an ignorant man. Sin, in fact, is a result of ignorance: the cure for it is enlightenment. The principle of Ahimsa does not prevent the existence of butchers among Hindus. It does not exclude the maintenance of soldiers, policemen and even executioners in the Hindu State. Buddha whose protest against animal sacrifice led to its abolition in canonical Hinduism, did not absolutely forbid the use of meat even by his monks. If the meat was not specially killed for him, a monk incurred no sin by eating it. This was in pursuance of the rule that a monk should never enquire what was served to him at meals or put in his begging bowl as food. Tradition says that the Buddha himself died of indigestion caused by eating boar's meat served to him at the home of a disciple. War and the profession of arms are not repugnant to Hinduism. The Gita is the handbook of the soldier as much as of the statesman and businessman. Hitler might claim that his actions are in accord with the teachings of the Gita, and that the pacifists are the greatest violators of Gita precepts. Hinduism and Hindus have suffered much by being credited with extravagant virtues as well as execrable vices. It is high time that the made it clear to the world, especially to the Western world, that they are no better and no worse than people elsewhere. Nobody would have raised any objection to Hitler if he was a Hindu, even if he was not a vegetarian. The point we wish to stress is that the attitude of India to Hitlerism cannot be deduced from the precepts of the Hindu or for that matter of the Muslim and the Christian religions which are as indigenous to India as Hinduism. Another misimpression we should like to remove is that all Hindus conduct themselves in accordance with their religion any more than the followers of other religions. Indians judge Hitlerism by the same standards as Europeans. Several Christian countries have preferred to remain neutral in this War. Obviously they do not conside that any religious principle is involved in this quarrel. It is the same with Indians. Many of them regard Hitler as a scourge of God, like Attila or Tamerlane, sent to chastise humanity for its sins. When the chastisement has served its purpose, God will hold his hand and heal the wounds of his children. This is the only position possible to any one who sincerely believes in an All just, All-merciful and All-loving Principle, as Ruler of the Universe. Lord Samuel was followed by the Marquis of Salisbury in what can be described as a spiteful and peevish speech. The noble Marquis said

> For the British Government in the present state of international relations to be indifferent to the welfare of any Muslim community would be sheer madness. Perhaps the whole issue of the international struggle may largely depend on the frame of the Muslim populations of the world.

Lord Salisbury is mistaken in thinking that the separate school of the Indian Muslims finds much sympathy or support in the indepedent Islamic countries.

The European Tangle:—There have been important developments in the political situation in Europe though the military situation can only be described as stalemate. First came M. Molotov's speech and the Comintern manifesto at the anniversary of the Revolution in both of which Germany was grouped with Great Britain and France as a capitalist imperialist Power. Before the astonishment caused by this unexpected analogy had time to subside, the Queen of Holland and the King of Belgium after a sudden and secret conference telegraphed an appeal to Great Britain, France and Germany to cease military operations and settle terms of peace by negotiation and thus save humanity from the horrors of which the sinking of ships and submarines has provided a terrible foretaste. M. Molotov's reference to Germany as a capitalistic and imperial system, like France and England, has been hailed in the United States and Italy as disclosing radical differences between the Soviet and the Nazi Governments, which bodes well for the peace of the world. Coming so soon after M. Molotov's address to the Supreme Soviet Council in which the warmest friendship was professed for Germany, it rather seems to be an invitation to Germany to adopt the Soviet system and thus consolidate the present pacts in an unbreakable ideological unity with her great neighbour. The feasibility of such a contingency has been foreseen by several students of Hitlerism. Herr Hitler's violent diatribes against Bolshevism in his book only shows how very much he would like to win Russia to his side. "Hate," says Paracelsus, "is but the mask of love." The conversion of Nazism into Sovietism will be the logical sequence of the division of Poland by mutual aggreement between the two Governments. That the barrier between the two is not insuperable was foretold by no less a Nazi authority than Herr Goebbels several years ago. Herr Goebbels in an open letter in the Volkischer Beobachter, November 1925, to a Communist, wrote "You and I, we are fighting one another without really being enemies...Perhaps the most dire necessity may bring us together." The Nazi Party, it is true, was in the embryonic stage in 1925, but Herr Goebbels remains the same man today and he is the powerful Propaganda Minister of the Chancellor-Fuehrer.

The Peace Move:—The appeal of the Sovereigns of Belgium and Holland to belligerent Powers, has been attributed to fear of invasion of their countries and even to pressure by Germany. It may also be due to their anxiety to prevent the extension of Soviet influence and perhaps the conversion of Europe to Bolshevism. Perhaps both are responsible for bringing about the intervention which is acknowledged to be very desirable in itself. Mr. Neville Chamberlain stated in the House of Commons on Wednesday that, before a reply can be given, the British Government should consult the Dominions and and France. India as the skeleton in the cupboard is not to be mentioned in this company. All the same India has an indefeasible right which she can omit to exercise only at peril to her soul, to declare her view on a matter which concerns humanity. Thousands of homes have already lost beloved members and millions are living in hourly suspense as to what news the telegraph or telephone may bring of the death by drowning or bombing of their sons, fathers, husbands, breadwinners. Their sorrow and suspense are shared by every man and woman of sensibility throughout the world. To this writer, this is a constant nightmare. And it is most probably so to others as well because the basic idea of Indian philosopy is a uncompromising denial of the appearances which separate men from each other and from God who is in us all. India, therefore, must proclaim her opinion on the intervention proposal, whether anybody asks her for it or cares for it or not. We do not claim to speak for any one but ourselves but we think that our views are likely to be shared by a considerable number of the Indian people. Our view is that their Majesties' appeal is a noble and couragous act of humanity. No higher courage can be thought of than that which has inspired the two Sovereigns to brave the charge which they must have known would be made that their action is inspired by fear of what might happen to themselves. Their appeal demands the most respectful consideration not only of the actual belligerents but of all, and that is the whole world, who may be unwillingly dragged into the hell of war.

"Provincial Differences":—The Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India refer to the political differences in the provinces between the Congress and the Moslem League which they wanted to be settled by negotiation These can only be the 'atrocities' on Muslims by Congress Governments alleged by Mr. Jinnah. A non-Congress leader, Dr. Ambedkar, has denied the existence of such grievances. The Congress Governments have categorically refuted them. The President of the Congress, Babu Rajendra Prasad, nevertheless offered to have them investigated by the Chief Justice of India, which Jinnah declined as he had submitted them to the Viceroy. So far as we know, the Viceroy has made no enquiries of his own. It is, therefore, difficult to see what His Excellency wants Congress to do about them. This is all the more puzzling as Lord Linlithgow and Lord Zetland have been profuse in their praise of the successful administration of provincial autonomy by the Provincial Governments, eight out of eleven of which are Congress Governments.

Buddhism in Indo-China:—Bhikku Narada of Ceylon in his interesting account of his visit to Cambodia in the October and November numbers of the Maha-Bodhi, speaks in high appreciation of the encouragement given by the French Colonial authorities to Buddhist institutions. The Bhikku was treated with great courtesy in Cochin China. The French Governor attended his sermons at Saigon. His Excellency told the Bhikku that when he was ill some time back he thought of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha and that he recovered from his illness. The Governor has created a Buddhist settlement in which he takes a personal interest. He presented it with a fine bronze image of the Buddha at a ceremony which the Bhikku was invited to attend. The Governor requested the Bhikku to give one of the Bo-saplings which he had taken with him from Ceylon, to be planted at the institution. When a Roman Catholic Missionary spoke disparagingly of Buddhism on one occasion, the Governor personally called at the Buddhist headquarters and expressed his disapproval of the conduct of the Padre.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, November 11, 1939.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE.

There has been little in the news about the progress of constitutional reform in the Philippine Islands, although nearly half the transition period of ten years laid down by the Independence Act of 1934 has elapsed. M. Molotov in his address to the Soviet Supreme Council reproached the United States and President Roosevelt for their interest in European affairs and particularly in the matter of Soviet relations with Finland, while neglecting the problem of Philippine independence nearer home. The implication that the United States has been pursuing an imperial policy in the Islands is not, however, according to facts. By the Philippine Independence Act of 1934, the United States Congress granted the Filipinos a large measure of autonomy, reserving economic and extra-national subjects to the U.S. Government. There was also a right of appeal to the U. S. judiciary. At the end of ten years the Islands were to have independence. There have been recent amendments to the Act but they all refer to economic relations between the U. S. A. and the Philippines. Under the Independence Act, the Philippine Islands would have to adjust themselves to full American tariffs and to pay a tax on exports to the United States in the last five years of the Commonwealth, or transition, period. The amendments to the Act which were signed on August 7 by President Roosevelt, extend to the Islands graded trade protection for the remaining years of the Commonwealth. These amendments do not give the Filipinos the full measure of protection they had sought; the U. S. Congress was not willing to consider any concessions beyond 1946 when the Islands would become independent. But they save the Islands from the total loss of their American markets for the next five years. The business and agricultural interests in the U. S. A. which regarded the inclusion of the Philippines within the American tariff system as a strong competing factor, were mainly instrumental in the passing of the Philippines Independence Act and they were also responsible for defeating President Roosevelt's original amendment for extending trade benefits to the Islands upto 1961. It is clear that, even if Filipino politicians turn aside from their agitation of the last thirty years and abandon independence, American competing interests will not readily allow the old free trade relations between the U. S. A. and the Philippines to continue. The Conference between the two Governments which is to meet in 1944 to consider trade relations, it has been stated, will not touch on the independence issue unless the American Congress is persuaded to allow it on the request of the Filipinos. The main industries of the Philippine Islands depend on the American market. In the five Commonwealth years that have passed, Americans accused the Filipinos of not exerting themselves to develop new markets, while Filipionos, official and unofficial, argued that they were crippled in not having the power to negotiate trade agreements and raise tariff barriers for the protection of their growing industries. The Islanders, however, are now faced with a difficult decision. They have to choose between complete politial independence and economic disaster, on the one side, and political association with the U. S. A. and a certain measure of economic security.

A factor which has had the effect of counteracting the separatist tendencies of American businessmen and Filipino politicians in recent years, has been the Sino-Japanese conflict. The Japanese have much to gain by taking possession of the Philippines and, if they are thwarted in China or win an early victory there, they might quite conceivably turn their attention to the Islands. The Filipinos have seen with the collapse of the League scheme of collective security that small nations must perforce join their fortunes to those of a greater neighbour. Many eminent Filipinos, President Quezon among them, are believed to be in favour of continuing the present relations with the U. S. A. In the next six years the duty-free quotas allowed to Philippine products will gradually diminish according to the terms of the Independence Act and with this decline the Filipinos will realise their economic dependence on the U. S. A. Though at present it is politically unsafe to oppose the Independence school, the realities of the situation are bound to make themselves felt. Increasing expenditure on national defence which is really inadequate by itself to resist foregn aggression, adds to the difficulties of the Government. Nor is the problem easier for the United States. Here too the international situation has led to a re-examination of American relations with Philippines. The United States has interests in the Orient. There is an influential body of opinion which condemns the surrender of American influence in the Philippines. They wish to reserve the undeveloped resources of the Islands for American exploitation. And they stress the strategic value of the Philippines and its inability to stand alone. The probabilities of the Filipinos accepting American sovereignty in preference to a possible invasion by a third party, depend entirely in the adoption of a peace policy by the United States. It is improbable that any Pacific power will launch a war against the U. S. A. But it is quite likely that if it happens to be involved in such a war it will choose the Philippines as the most vulnerable point in the U. S. political system.

The solution to the Philippine question, to our mind, does not lie as M. Molotov seemed to imply in the immediate establishment of Philippine independence, but in the ultimate inclusion of the Islands in the American Federation. The influence of American ideals and institutions has been complete in the Philippines. America has all along shown great concern at

Japanese aggression on China. But there would be more than sympathy for any appeals for help which the Philippines might make even after Independence. In January 1939, a newspaper survey showed that 46 per cent of the Filipinos were in favour of American intervention in the event of attack from outside. Events since that date would, if anything, have tended to increase that figure. On the side of the Islands, therefore, we can safely assume that membership in the United States Federation would be an attractive alternative to Independence. The reluctance of the Americans to consider the proposition is probably due to the fact that the United States is growing racially more rigid than it was some thirty years ago when Alaska was given a seat in the Congress. The Alaskans, it is true, made use of this right to agitate ceaselessly for autonomy. But there are no dangers on that score to be dreaded now with the Philippines. It is a matter of more than economic security. Without an alternative which affords the Philippine Islands a respected place within the American system, whatever the trade advantages offered, the time factor would work without question for Japan which is nearer to the Islands, or for a reorganised China. If one accepts the inability of the Philippines to stand alone—and no one seems to question this—one must also recognize that American domination in the past has prevented the assimilation of the Filipinos into some Asiatic system which would not have differentiated between them and other Asiatics. This in itself confers a moral responsibility on the United States to accord the Philippines a permanent place in its political system. The Commonwealth stage is not permanent and it is not meant to be. By itself it satisfies no national ambitions. To prolong it on the ground that Independence would be inadvisable and disastrous, would be admission of defeat on all sides. But an extension can readily be accepted as a preliminary to final incorporation within the United States of America.

Martyr to Income Tax :—The recent revision of the Income Tax system has been very trying to those who have the misfortune to have incomes. These are for all practical purposes regarded as criminal tribes and are subjected to surveillance in various forms. But it would seem that the new Act is even more trying to the officers who work it. At a Coroner's inquest some days ago on Mr. J. B. Bird, Commissioner of Income Tax (Central), who shot himself at the Taj Mahal Hotel, the jury found that he had committed suicide. They added the following rider to their verdict :

> In fairness to Mr. Bird, who was a brilliant young officer of the Crown, we place on record our considered opinion that the work of investigation into the income-tax returns with which he was entrusted, was so complicated that it caused him very considerable mental strain with the result that on the morning of October 17, his mind had become temporarily unhinged and in that state he fired a pistol shot through his head.

GANDHIJI AND M. P.'S.

Edward Thompson is a curious Englishman. His first book which brought him into the limelight, was "The Other Side of the Medal," in which he showed that atrocities during the Mutiny were not confined to the Indian side but were more than matched by the British. Before that he was a Professor in some Mission College. After that, he wrote a book on Tagore. Later, he went to the United States and one heard from friends there of his propagandist activities. Some days ago, it was stated in the papers that Mr. Thompson had flown to Allahabad from Britain and that this was to be his farewell visit to this country. While in Allahabad, he confided to three prominent public men that several members of the House of Commons had ceased to regard Gandhiji as a saint because of some stories of his sensual life in the Marathi Press. The three prominent gentlemen of Allahbad contradicted this impression of the members of the House of Commons and actually got Mr. Thompson to write a letter to Mr. Greenwood, Deputy Leader of the Labour Opposition in the House of Commons, conveying their testimonial to Gandhiji's personal character! Romain Rolland in his book on Swami Vivekananda relates that some people who were deeply chagrined by the triumph of the Hindu Sanyasi at the first Parliament of Religions at Chicago in 1893, set afloat stories in detraction of his personal life and habits. In a footnote (p 49) Romain Roland writes :

> It goes without saying that they produced the classic accusation of Anglo-Saxon countries, seduction. In order to stop the false rumour spread by a vulgar-minded clergyman that he had wronged a servant dismissed by the Governor of Michigan, letters of public denial (March 1893) were necessary from the Governor's wife testifying to the moral dignity of Vivekananda. But no denials ever repair the damage done by unscrupulous lies.

With that, the Thompson story went clean out of mind. It has been revived by Gandhiji thinking fit to give an elaborate exposition of his theory and practice in sex matters in the current Harijan. Why should Gandhiji who had not thought it worth his while to take notice of the stories when they appeared in the Marathi papers, be so anxious to put himself right with some members of Parliament? M. P.'s are not saints nor are they elected by their constituencies for their freedom from sensuality. Observers of Gandhiji's public life might have noticed that the cultivation of the good opinion of public men and women is a frequent pre-occupation with him. Amidst his wildest denunciations of British rule may be detected insinuating references calculated to enhance the self-esteem of the Englishman. His policy has not been without response. A young British publicist passing through Bombay some months ago let fall the remark, "Whenever Mr. Gandhi and the Government are in conflict, the British public is disposed to believe that Gandhi is right and the Government wrong." That he was not quite happy about it, goes without saying.

M. Romain Rolland speaks of the charge of seduction as being a classic one in Anglo-Saxon countries. The English in India, however, have from the first repudiated the Puritan vices of the homeland. When the Collector of a district circulated a tract on religion and morality among the people, Sir Thomas Munro severely censored his conduct in a Minute in which he told the official that they were not in India to preach morality but to carry on the administration honestly and efficiently. That was a century ago. In the nineties of the last century, Lord Lansdowne, then Viceroy, replied to a memorial requesting him to abstain from attending entertainments at which nautch women performed, that he did not consider that it fell within the duties of the Governor-General to act as censor of the conduct of Indian gentlemen who extended to him their hospitality and that it was for the memorialists to dissuade the latter from continuing the practice to which they objected. A year or two earlier, when Lord Ripon's Education Commission recommended the imparting of moral instruction in schools and colleges, the English Principal of a college refused to take upon himself the task of teaching morality to his pupils and devolved it on his chief Indian colleague, an orthodox Brahmin of liberal views. Before the opening of the Suez Canal and the influx of English women into this country, high English officials had large harems and in the "Life of Metcalfe," (is it Mr. Thompson's ?) it is stated that a very distinguished soldier had eleven ladies of his Zenana promenading in the streets of Delhi on the backs of eleven elephants. There is a story told of Lady Curzon that when a Viceregal visit to visit Burma was being planned, she was told by a high official, Sir Bampfylde Fuller, that an important English official in Rangoon had married a Burmese lady. "Why married ?" was the piquant exclamation of the Viceriene. In Curzon's time also it fell to Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, himself not a Puritan, to rebuke severely Sir James Westland who had spoken depreciatingly of Puritanism in connection, perhaps, with the agitation against the Opium Trade with China.

The characteristic Anglo-Saxon vice which Englishmen in India have left behind in the homeland, has been picked up by a section of our vernacular journalists. It is a tradition with high sanction with the Maharastrian Press to seek to pull down the leaders of a movement as the most effective way of crushing it. For over two decades this was tried on social reformers. It was next cautiously extended to politics. The stories about Gandhiji began to be current after the Khare episode in the Central Provinces. It is not necessary to defend Gandhiji's action at every step, in order to trace the origin of the calumnies to this unfortunate episode in Congress politics. The quarrel became a Hindi-Maharashtrian one. No quarter was to be given on either side. And somehow Gandhiji came to be regarded as the chief apologist of the Hindustanis. The excommunication of Subhas Bose brought the Bengali Press in line with that of Maharashtra. The Tamil Press was not much behind. The criticisms of the Tamil Press against compulsory Hindi in schools, were a mass of vulgar vituperation against the late Madras Prime Minister and his colleagues. No cause is advanced with fistfuls of filth from the gutter. The publication of some letters of Gandhiji to a young lady, gave a handle to the Marathi mud-slingers. One can express no opinion on their contents without having read them. That it was wholly well-intentioned, there can be no manner of doubt. Education in sex matters, however, if it should be imparted at all, should be undertaken only by persons specially trained for the work. Even near relationship is not enough. Sigmund Freud was greatly embarrassed in his investigations in psycho-therapy by several of his women patients falling in love with him. He had great difficulty, he says, in getting their affection directed to more legitimate channels. It is probable that the complaint against Dada Lekhraj in respect of his Om Mandli resulted from some similar misplacement.

TOWARDS UNDERSTANDING MR. JINNAH

"I should advise Simon," wrote Lord Birkenhead then Secretary of State for India to the Viceroy, the Lord Irwin now Lord Halifax, "to see at all stages important people who are not boycotting the Commission, particularly Moslems and the depressed classes. I should widely advertise all his interviews with representative Moslems. The whole policy now is obvious. It is to terrify the immense Hindu population by the apprehension that the Commission is being got hold of by the Moslems and may present a report altogether destructive of the Hindu position, thereby securing a solid Muslim support, and leaving Jinnah high and dry." This passage in a private letter to the Viceroy from his father is reproduced by the present Lord Birkenhead in his book, "Birkenhead, the Last Phase." Lord Birkenhead was a bit of a cynic. He was not adept at camouflage. In the words italicised he clarified the policy which has been clouded in a mass of high-flown platitudes for many years by his predecessors. British policy in foreign and Indian affairs has preserved a remarkable continuity. The Birkenhead definition of Indian policy has not changed though the language in which it is stated since is characterised by the usual camouflage. The reference to Mr. Jinnah in Lord Birkenhead's letter, is of great interest as a help towards understanding him. Lord Birkenhead regarded Mr. Jinnah as an irreconcilable. So did Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. Mr. Jinnah was invited to the first Round Table Conference. He was not invited to the next Conference and the other representatives of the Muslim League raised no voice of protest at his exclusion. The remarkable thing about Mr. Jinnah is that he has maintained his own ground without waiting to see how many others followed him. Some years ago a meeting of the Bombay Muslim League was broken up by some bigots who objected to Mr. Jinnah presiding as he did not cultivate a beard as orthodox Muslims should. He is still without a beard but now a large part of Indian Muslims accept him as their political leader and, in default of a suitable alternative, have named him permanent President of their premier political organization. His concessions to communal convention are limited to the adoption of the pyjama, sherwani and moghul cap on ceremonial occasions. Otherwise he pursues his own path indifferent to what his followers think of him. Mr. Jinnah is not a demagogue. Among Indian political leaders, he belongs to the type of Sir Pherozesha Mehta and Sir Shankaran Nair, men who cannot be diverted from the path which they had marked out for themselves by threats, cajolery or coaxing. He owes his ascendancy over the Muslims of India today entirely to his strength of character and inflexible political integrity. He has literally forced them, reluctantly at first, to acknowledge his leadership by sheer force of character.

Is the Jinnah of today the same Jinnah whom Lord Birkenhead wanted to be left high and dry? Congressmen who put their faith in Gandhiji as the only man who can bring political (as well as other) salvation to India, naturally regard Mr. Jinnah as an apostate from the true faith of nationalism. They hold that he has let himself down to the level of a communal leader whose one aim is to get as much as possible for Muslims without regard to the legitimate rights of other communities, particularly, Hindus. His recent tirades against the Hindu renaissance and revival certainly show that he is embittered against Hindus and regards them with some measure of contempt. To some extent this may be due to the intrinsic antagonism between his unbending manner and the supple ways of prominent Hindu politicians with whom he has been dealing. Largely, however, it is assumed by him as a counterpoise against the hard fact of the immense numerical majority of the Hindu population. By treating the Hindus as negligible and in no other way, can Mr. Jinnah, or the British Government for that matter, reconcile in their own minds and conscience the discriminatory provisions introduced in a constitution professing to be democratic. There is another explanation. It might have been noticed that, unlike other leaders, when Mr. Jinnah makes a statement, it has not got to be followed by elucidations of its meaning by himself or his friends and colleagues. When he says Independence, for instance, he means it and not the substance of it or a substitute for it. Mr. Jinnah has evidently the feeling that the present methods of the Congress which he identifies with the Hindu community, may lead some thousands to prison but nowhere near to Independence. Then, it may be asked, why does he negotiate with Congress leaders? So far as is known he has never taken the initiative in negotiations. When the Congress leaders come to him with a proposal for negotiations he can not very well refuse. Personally he likes, by way of change it may be from his Muslim clientile, to exchange ideas with individual Congressmen. He has recently expressed his pleasure in Pandit Jawaharlal's company. He and Mr. Subhas Bose have got on very well in each other's company. Where will it all end? If there is a settlement between Mr. Jinnah and the Congress, it will be on Mr. Jinnah's terms. Khaddar and the other fripperies of the so-called constructive programme will be unceremoniously brushed aside. Non-violence will cease to be shibboleth and may thereby become a reality. If two men ride a horse, one must ride behind. That one, we may be sure, will not be Mr. Jinnah. So long as Mr. Jinnah is at the head of the Muslim League, there is no reason to fear that there will be any violent departure from the principles of constitutional Government. But after him? The same question may be asked of any other leader. What will happen after Mussolini? After Hitler? After Stalin? If there is vitality in a movement, that is to say, if it has roots in the realities of national life, it will assuredly create for itself competent leaders to take the place of those who quit. If it is only a passing phase born of momentary exigencies, it will disappear without leaving any trace of itself. In any case, the leader must comport himself as if he and his movement will last for ever.

TRAINING FOR JOURNALISM.

(By A Journalist.)

At the meeting of the Senate of the University of Madras held in the last week of the last month, a motion that a diploma course in Journalism be founded in the University and that the Academic Council be requested to formulate proposals in this behalf was adopted by 30 votes against 27. About two years ago a Committee was appointed by the University to consider the very same question in all its aspects and it was ultimately decided that the University can help intending aspirants for a journalistic career by including such subjects in the school of public administration which was then proposed to be started—it is now in working order—as likely to be useful to them, leaving them to supplement their theoretical knowledge by a course of practical training in a newspaper office. Five years ago, an attempt was made to start a school of journalism in the Calcutta University, but it met with a good deal of opposition. It may also be mentioned in passing that the Inter-University Board had, at one of its annual meetings, blessed the starting of diploma courses in journalism, through it was definitely opposed to the idea of granting degrees in that subject.

So far as one could see nothing has happened in the last two years to render the revival of the proposal either necessary or urgent. The usual arguments advanced in favour of the project may be thus summarised. Journalism is a great power in every well-ordered country and its influence in India, which is already great, is bound to grow still further. The public, and the Universities have, therefore, an interest in the provision of satisfactory arrangements for training young men and women not only in the tricks of the trade, but in all those subjects a knowledge of which is essential for a successful career in the profession. Unless this is done, the standard of journalism is not likely to rise. That a country deserves the newspaper it has is only a half-truth: those engaged in newspaper work have unlimited opportunities of educating the public, improving its taste and otherwise elevating its morale. And is it not the duty of the Universities to see to it that there exists a sufficient number of competent persons from whom newspapers may recruit their staff? Further, the establishment of schools of Journalism may, to some extent, relieve unemployment. Lastly, such establishments in America and Great Britain are doing wonderful work and shall India lag behind?

In sober truth, it must be admitted that there has been no demand, so for at any rate as Madras is concerned, for such a course from the newspapers. Madras is famous for its newspapers conducted in English and Indian languages, but the profession is not organised: there is not even a journalists' association. They have very competent staff and their own methods of recruitment and so far they have not felt the necessity of seeking the aid of the University. A few of them, notably the Hindu, have provided facilities for training and the Hindu has been offering a scholarship every year now for several years. Papers conducted in the Indian languages (the world vernacular is now taboo), have so far not experienced any particular difficulty in securing the men they want. They take in young men with a background of general education, and afford them facilities for learning work in the various branches. Some of them ultimately turn out to be good writers, though it must be noted that persons without knowing English and without college education, exhibit a style which is wonderful and show a knowledge of public questions, Indian and foreign, which is praiseworthy.

There is no royal road to success in the profession of journalism, just as there is none in other walks of life. One must start at the beginning and by dint of hard work, rise slowly in the ladder. A school of journalism in the present circumstances of the country, with a very limited field, is an embarrassment rather than a help. Things are certainly improving, but the profession is precarious. With a few exceptions the service is low paid, tenure is not steady and openings are few. A diploma course would attract a number of youths, who after the training would be set adrift, swelling the ranks of the unemployed. Books on journalism love to catalogue the qualifications of journalists in a manner awful to behold. But a little reflection will show that the qualities required are not after all formidable; they are just those required in other equally strenuous professions. The specialised knowledge, the tricks, the technique can all be gathered in the offices themselves in the course of, say, five or six years, by intensive study and by actual experience. On the other hand, the holder of a diploma, when he enters an office and is not given 'writing' work, will be disappointed and will perhaps bid adieu to journalism after having wasted many months in the University. The central fact is that the industry does not want the help of the University. When newspapers increase in number, when the industry can absorb quite a fair proportion of trained men every year, when the prospects are brighter than they are now, every University in India may have its school for diploma courses. In the meantime, we shall leave the newspaper alone.

BRAHMO SAMAJ MARRIAGE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your valued columns of 19th August 1939, Mr. K. B. Gajendragadkar of Satara commented critically upon the statement of the Lord Chancellor of England that "the Indian Courts would not recognise the validity of a second marriage while a person continued to be a member of the (Sadharan Brahmo Samaj) sect and his first wife was alive:" and he ended with an appeal to Brahmos to throw "more and clear light" on His Lordship's statement. Since no Brahmo has yet responded to the appeal though it is more than two months now, may I, as a mere Hindu, venture to point out where the critical comment requires amplification?

After cordially recognising that "the Brahmos are as a rule monogamous" we should also note that the Brahmos as a rule solemnise their marriages by registration under the Special Marriage Act of 1872, which enforces monogamy and penalises subsequent polygamy. They may do so with a solemn declaration that they do profess the Hindu religion. (This can be done only under the Act as amended by Gour.—Ed., I. S. R.) or that they do not profess any of the eight religions specified in the Act. In either case, the Act ensures that the marriage solemnised under it shall be a monogamous one, that is, between persons neither of whom has a wife or husband living at the time (Section 2 (1)).

It further ensures that persons once married under the Act shall not with impunity shake off the shackles of monogamy by the simple expedient of asserting that they have not by calling themselves Brahmos, ceased to be Hindus governed by the Hindu law of marriage, or that, after their first marriage, they came to profess another religion which permits a second marriage while the first wife is living (Section 16).

Viewed in this light the Lord Chancellor's statement will be seen to be an understatement rather than a misstatement of the legal position of married Brahmos in India; that is, of persons married as Brahmos after joining the Brahmo Samaj. It is surely correct in premising that Indian Courts would not recognise the validity of a Brahmo's bigamous marriage. It has erred slightly in supposing that such invalidity would attach to his second marriage only if he continued to be a member of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, whereas the true legal position is that sueh marriage would be equally invalid and punishable as bigamous even if he became a Muhammadan after the first marriage. It is thus an understatement.

But there is also a grave error underlying or lurking in that statement which cannot be ignored. It is the implication that every person who becomes a member of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj of India places himself automatically under the governance of some marriage law which is monogamic and that he is thenceforward precluded from marrying, even for the first time, except according to the rules and regulations of that law so long as he continues to be a member of the Samaj. The view disclosed an ignorance or ignoring of the fact that there is no Brahmo Marriage law in India specifically so-called, or any monogamous law which a Brahmo is legally bound to follow at his marriage. Even the children born of a Brahmo couple married under Act III of 1872 are not themselves bound to marry under the same Act through they may be members of the Brahmo Samaj. They are legally free to marry as ordinary Hindus do and their first marriages and additional ones too, if any, will certainly be held valid under the Hindu law by the Indian Courts. The law of monogamy embodied in Act III of 1872 attaches to none but those individuals who, whether Brahmo Samajists or not, Brahmos, voluntarily seek its aid for their own marriage. Hindu couples who join the Brahmo Samaj after being married in the traditional Hindu way, are entirely out of its purview in spite of their newly accepted Brahmo tenets. It is the misfortune of the Brahmo Samaj, not its fault, that the Indian Legislature has sadly failed, ever since the time of Sir Henry Maine and Keshub Chunder Sen, to give this religious body a legal entity and a binding family law of its own suited to its special tenets and high ideals.

We appreciate the belated efforts of the Lords Committee in England to retrieve the credit of British gifts and British patronage by brushing aside the trickish legal cobwebs woven by die-hard imperialists to prevent the present Lord Sinha from taking the lordly seat earned by his illustrious father in the service of the Empire. But it is a fact which should be faced without quibbling and assessed at its proper value, that the late Lord (S. P.) Sinha and his wife were married as Hindus with Hindu ritual before they joined the Brahmo Samaj. If this very fact raises a bar sinister against their son, the present Lord, and is held in Britain to be such a defect that the Peers of the Realm cannot tolerate his presence in the same House in which his father was free to sit with them though born of like Hindu parents, we wish the honourable aspirant will rather spurn the invidious and contempt ful honour which he inherited in a foreign land, than agree for its sake to disown and feel ashamed of his Hindu parentage and try to hide his spiritual and legal identity as a Hindu under the sign-board of the Brahmo Samaj, which we all sincerely admire for its tenet of monogamy but which is none the less a Hindu sect governed by Hindu family law.

"DOMINION STATUS."

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The question has been raised whether, after Sir Samuel Hoare's statement in the House of Commons, that 'there are no two kinds of Dominion Status,' Mahatma Gandhi and the Congress President are justified in demanding further clarification regarding the term 'Dominion Status,' and its application to India. The significance of Sir Hoare's present statement on the question can be understood and appreciated only by comparing it with his pronouncements in the past. Replying to Mr. Churchill during a debate in the House of Commons, Sir Hoare said, "The Statute of Westminister has no more to do with the statement of the Government policy than the man in the moon. During the discussions that took place in the meetings of the Joint Select Committee, the sum and substance of Sir S. Hoare's views may be given follows:—"The conditions in India differ in certain definite respects from the conditions in any of the Dominions, notably in the field of Defence, and on that, any Constitutional Act must take account of these differences of conditions. The Government policy is to take account of these differences in the conditions and to give India very wide opportunity for future development. The Government proposals have in them the seeds of growth into the Dominion Status, assuming that the conditions that separate India from the Dominions are eventually removed. Nobody on earth can say here and now when the precedent conditions for such a state of affairs will have been reached. The Government are acting fully within the spirit of all these pledges and are interpreting these pledges in the best possible way in the circumstances with which they are faced. The pledges are almost always in general terms. Their strength is much more moral and implicit than it is specific. There is a great deal of difference between the Dominion Status now (1933) and the Dominion Status before the Statute of Westminister was passed. The White Paper proposals have defined quite clearly, and Indians know perfectly well, the limits to which the British Government are prepared to go." Again, Lord Rankeillour pointed out that 'the statements of the Viceroy can be overruled by the Parliament;' and the Marquis of Salisbury observed, "We will not admit a pledge, except a conditional pledge." The then Prime Minister definitely stated and wrote to Mr. Baldwin that the use of the term 'Dominion Status' did not involve any change of policy. Lord Irwin himself said, in the course of the discussions, "My much discussed declaration dealt entirely with the realm of ultimate purpose. It made no commitments whatever as to date." Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru remarked, "If at this stage we are told that the declaration only means responsible government and nothing more, speaking for myself, I have nothing more to do with this Constitution." So, Mahatma Gandhi and Rajendra Prasad did well in demanding further elucidation now. When we recapitulate the past utterances of the Lord Privy Seal and other British statesmen, it is well that all doubts are dispelled, and our disillusionments are cleared. Hence Sir Samuel Hoare's statement that the Dominion Status that is contemplated is the Dominion Status of 1926, and not some system of government that deprives India of full status of equality with other members of the British Commonwealth, is of very great value to India, and is a landmark in India's constitutional progress, if the Viceroy answers in the affirmative the questions put by Gandhi and Prasad. Again, if practical steps are immediately taken to implement this great pronouncement by the introduction of the representatives of the great parties in the Central Government, India's constitutional advance along peaceful lines is assured. It is to be fervently hoped that the Viceroy's further talks will lead to this result.

[Lord Zetland, the Secretary of State for India, said in the House of Lords on Tuesday that the suspicions raised in India by Sir Samuel Hoare's speech were unfounded. Sir Samuel, he said, "referred to the Dominion Status of 1926 because it was in that year that the Imperial Conference described the status of the Dominions, and the status so described has not been altered by anything which has since occured, the Statute of Westminister having merely given legal effect to certain consequences of the constitutional position as was then recognised."—Ed., *I. THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Congress leaders from Gandhiji downwards have been writing and speaking about a Constituent Assembly for deciding the future constitution of India. I happen to be one of those unfortunate persons who are unable to grasp any idea unless it is explained in sufficient detail for understanding it clearly; and so far as I know no Congress leader has hitherto done it. I hope that among the readers of your papers there are some who know all about it, and I trust that one of them will take the trouble of giving enlightenment to me and many others similarly situated. The following are the matters which require elucidation.

Is there any instance of a Constituent Assembly having settled the constitution of an area and a population anything as large as that of India and a third of which is ruled by autocrats? Are the representatives elected on adult suffrage or on what basis and, if not on adult suffrage, how would the limitation be justified? For what number or area should there be one representative, and in what manner is the representation of minorities to be safeguarded? Do they vote separately or jointly and in the latter case how is adequate representation made? Are the States to be represented in the same manner, and how is the consent of Princes obtained, or are the States to be left out?

Has any single leader who so glibly speaks of it at any time calculated the probable number of representatives and their communal or political texture? For any kind of adequate representation will not the numbers go up to several thousands, and how and where is such a large number to collect? And how will such a large body set about framing a constitution?

If it is proposed to follow the Congress practice in which the Working Committee first meets and forms resolutions, and all amendments are almost invariably rejected, on what basis is that Committee to be formed and how is it proposed to give in it adequate representation to minorities, communal and political, and to the States? Will a constitution be drawn up by this Committee, or only general resolutions agreed to, subject to appointment of another Committee to draw it up; and will there be a subsequent meeting of the general body to discuss and adopt the Constitution? How are the expenses proposed to be met?

If all these questions are answered satisfactorily, a constituent Assembly would be the ideal method; but otherwise, some other method has to be adopted —and there is none better than agreement between leaders in British India and the States, followed subsequently by agreement by the British Government after consulting the Chamber of Princes.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The plethora of letters, statements and speeches, regarding the present political situation appearing in the Press makes interesting reading and reveals the existence of a very dangerous lack of frankness on all sides. While all are agreed, or almost so, as to the country's political destination—Dominion Status—none is willing to say how that system of Government is to be made to work. The British Government is concerned with the difficulty of adjusting rival claims; the Congress gives nebulous assurances to the minorities that they will be protected in a free India without indicating what such protection is to be; the Muslim League only points out the need of tackling the political problem afresh, without indicating the safeguards which it would like the new constitution to provide; the other minorities follow suit and leave us to wonder what they want.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Isn't it time, Sir, for all who are perturbed by the present development to sit down independantly of the others and work out schemes of political development which in their opinion, would secure the right type of self-Government for our country? Mutual fault-finding needs to be replaced by a serious attempt on all sides to adjust the differences which cannot be denied so that Self-Government may be an accomplished fact in the near future.

If schemes such as I have suggested are worked out, they will present the political aspirations of our people as clearly as in a mirror and the greatest common measure of agreement which is being so eagerly sought, will probably be found. This certainly is the task to which the energies of all the contending interests ought to be seriously directed if we do not mean to stagnate and ultimately bring ruin upon ourselves.

SILENCE AND SPEECH.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have been a reader of your journal and you will permit me to congratulate you on the impartial way you publish your views. In your issue dated November 4th, there is a most praiseworthy article on "Silence and Speech." I agree not only with the words but with every letter of it. Why? Here is my reason.

A week or so ago before the publication of the article, I had almost been drawn to the painful necessity of putting forward my grievances and fulminations. I was almost on the point of answering criticism but lest I be saying too much and for the remembrance of the Persian (now Iranian) philosophical quotation given below, I remained silent. When I read your article I said to myself that it was as well I had remained silent.

The quotation will speak for itself. For those of your readers who do not delight in knowing Persian, I write the words in Roman script and translate them into English:

Do Chiz Akla Pareh Ast:
Dum Faroo-Bastan Ba Wakte Gooftan,
Wa Gooftan Ba Wakte Khamoshi.

Translated this means, "Two things are against wisdom: That is, to hold your breath when you should speak and to speak when you should keep quiet." After reading your "Silence and Speech," I am glad that I observed silence.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANADLWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, t is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

M. Molotov's Address:—The British and French Governments have been at great pains to satisfy themselves and the world that the Russian invasion and absorption of the eastern and larger half of what was the territory of the Polish State, is not an aggression by an European Power against which they had pledged themselves to defend Poland. Lord Halifax in the House of Lords, while averring that he was not defending the action of Russia, mentioned, as circumstances which had to be taken into account in forming a judgment on Russia's action, certain facts such as that the parts annexed originally belonged to Russia and were forcibly taken from her by the newly created Polish State without the sanction of the League of Nations and that Russia acted not of her own free will but at the instigation of Germany. The British Prime Minister declared at the same time that the Treaty with Poland promised support only against Germany and the Polish Government was aware of it and approved of it. Judging from the address which M. Molotov, the Russian Commissar for Foreign Affairs, made at the meeting of the Supreme Council of the Soviet Unions on Tuesday, it does not seem that Russia is equally solicitous to avoid a rupture with the Western democracies. He reaffirmed in emphatic terms the newly forged bonds between Germany and Soviet Russia and ridiculed the attempts to throw doubt on their strength and durability. He reiterated Russia's determination to be neutral in the War so far as military intervention was concerned, but he also made it clear that Russia's neutrality does not exclude economic assistance as exemplified since by her buying out all German ships interned in Russian ports and sending large supplies of food and raw materials to Germany. Implicit in M. Molotov's speech is the sentiment that any attempt to wrest the newly-acquired part of Poland from the Soviet Union, will be resisted, if necessary, by armed force. The Soviet Government has not waited till the end of the war to confer the status of an equal member of the Union of Soviets on the new territories. Representatives from them attended as regular members the meeting of the Supreme Council on Tuesday and the speech of the Ukrainian delegate, who was honoured with a seat next to M. Stalin, in his native dialect, is reported to have been received with much enthusiasm by representatives from all parts of Russia. M. Molotov in his address made a point of the fact that Soviet troops entered Polish territory only after the flight of the Polish Government into Rumania had left the country without an authority to preserve law and order. His argument for demanding concessions from Finland namely, that Leningrad, the second most important city in Soviet Russia, was only twenty miles distant from the Finnish border and within the range of modern artillery,—is hardly convincing. It is a very good reason for fortifying Leningrad —and it is stated that the Finnish Government has declared itself ready to help in this—but none whatever for demanding the retrocession of the Finnish boundary to a distance from which Leningrad would be beyond the range of modern gunnery. In form and style Mr. Molotov's address was a masterpiece.

India's Lines of Defence :—In September India was assured on high authority that her first lines of Defence were Egypt and Singapore and that, therefore, the garrisoning of these places was an Indian interest. Mr. Wedgwood Benn in his speech in the House of Commons last week extended them to still more distant regions. He said :

> Indians now say, 'We have gone into the war and we were never consulted.' That is true, but from the Government point of view from September 3, possibly before, India was the target and in justice to the Viceroy and perhaps to the other Dominions but certainly to India, it must be said that Germany was on the march towards the east. If it had not been for Soviet Russia and the Turkish Treaty, Germany might have gone from Berlin to Vienna, from Vienna to Prague, and from Prague to Warsaw and further. It had to be stopped. We in London do not want this to go on nor do Indians in Delhi. From the Viceroy's point of view, we have to remember that he had to act very swiftly. India was in danger and he had a duty to perform in seeing that it was safeguarded.

In other words India's lines of defence are all over Europe and there is no place where her interests are not jeopardised by the aggression of a Foreign Power!

The War of Ideas:—In a war for domination the issues involved are straight and any weapon is justified, the only criterion being its utility and the success which attends its use. But an ideological war presents quite a different aspect. Here the first care must be to avoid, whatever the consequences, the temptation of descending to your enemy's level in fighting him. You certainly cannot seek to fight him "with his own weapons." British statesmen have repeated since the outbreak of the war against Hitlerism that Britain's war is an ideological one. The two months of war we have already witnessed, also bear this out. Poland to which the ideals raised by the Allies least applied, was the scene of intense war activity. There was little difference between political systems in Germany and Poland and consequently the conflict was one of action. With Western democracies, however, the position is the reverse. Germany having overthrown the system which France and Britain still maintain, there is a real difference in ideas. In the result the war of words has overshadowed the physical war. In the realm of ideas it holds as true today as it was two thousand years ago, What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? It was because of this that we welcomed Mr. Chamberlain's statement in the House of Commons that Britain would not as a retaliatory measure resort to the bombing of open German towns, and regretted that it was not more categorical. Six eminent women in Britain had addressed a similar appeal to Mr. Chamberlain—Vera Brittain, Storm Jameson, Maude Royden, Sybil Thorndike and two others—on the outbreak of war. We are impelled to refer again to this by the White Paper on German atrocities in concentration camps. The Government admit at the outset that they have been provoked into this action by German propaganda accusing Great Britain of atrocities in South Africa forty years ago. "In view of this shameless propaganda which is wholly without foundation," runs the White Paper, "His Majesty's Government think it opportune to publish some reports they have received of the treatment accorded in Germany itself to German nationals." The argument that the disclosures are opportune "in view of shameless (German) propaganda" is worthless. It is at all times a poor excuse to urge that your actions are provoked by similar acts of your enemy. In a war of principle it is particularly so.

The Time Factor:—From the point of view of fitness of time, there is nothing in the present which becomes revelations of atrocities ignored or overlooked or condoned for six years. The reports go back to 1933 and most of them have been common knowledge, except among those leaders whose anxiety for friendship with Germany, closed their eyes and ears to them. Now they are repeated by British consular representatives in Central Europe, who had sent in reports for the past two years. for reasons which are not clear. Now that there has been a break in the Congress administrations, it is right to observe that on the whole they have distinguished themselves by the honesty, sound sense, and wise moderation of their measures and policies. Mistakes they have made but they are mostly mistakes of inexperience and over-zeal. The only weak point in the armour of the Congress has been the Central Provinces Government. We have no doubt that it has been a high-principled Government but it certainly has suffered from not invariably enjoying the reputation which the other Congress Governments have enjoyed.

Permit-Holders:—The Bombay Government published immediately after the introduction of Prohibition a list of some one hundred and seventy men and women who had applied for and been granted licenses for consuming alcoholic drinks on the ground of health. We have been expecting more names to be released to the press but, for some mysterious reason, although many more permits must have been issued, no more lists have been sent out by the Information Office. There are many arguments against publishing such lists. There are some in favour of publishing them. But there can be none for penalising some permit-holders with publicity and saving the rest. Apart from the injustice to the first 170, such a want of method leads naturally to the gravest suspicions and lends credence to all manner of insinuations. A great deal of the troubles of the Congress Governments has arisen out of this hand-to-mouth administrative method which left the public in a state of perplexed uncertainty.

Prohibition Subsidies:—In the Bombay Legislative Assembly, the Hon. Dr. M. D. Gilder, Minister in charge, explained on Monday that a sum of Rs. 9,000 had been paid out to seven Urdu, three Marathi, one Gujerati and one English newspapers, for propaganda in connection with Prohibition. There were two reasons which Dr. Gilder gave for these subsidies. The first of these was that the Government wanted newspapers with large circulations, with a traditional Prohibition policy, to carry on Prohibition work in the country. The second that these newspapers suffered from loss of revenue because their advertisements—presumably other than liquor advertisements as the papers were Prohibitionists—had been cut off and had appealed to Government for help. If the newspapers were "traditionally Prohibition" newspapers, we should have thought that they would have gladly published any Prohibition news that Dr. Gilder passed on to them, without the added spur of a Government subsidy. From the point of view of propaganda, therefore, the Government has thrown away money which they might have applied to better use in the direct service of the Prohibition Propaganda Board which itself was bringing out till last week a Bulletin of Prohibition news. The loss of revenue argument is one that is very difficult to prove and we are surprised that Dr. Gilder was satisfied with letters written to the Editors of these newspapers protesting against their policies. So far as we can see, with one newspaper, at any rate, out of those mentioned by the Minister, there has been neither rise nor fall in advertisements since Prohibition. Government might well have asked itself whether it was worth having the support of newspapers who looked to it to make good any loss in income consequent on the carrying out of "a traditional Prohibition policy." Dr. Gilder himself, if the report of his speech in the Bombay Chronicle is correct, did not think very highly of the press he had subsidised. "He thanked the other papers which did not get subsidies and did not approach Government but carried on Prohibition propaganda in a creditable manner." A little thought would have convinced the Minister that the subsidies were not calculated to bring credit either to the press or to the Government. They weaken the value of any support which the Government may receive from any newspaper until the suspicion that there is a financial reason for the advocacy has been removed. The only redeeming feature of the whole transaction is that it was only for three months.

Marx on India:—Except for one or two casual remarks in Trotsky's History of the Russian Revolution, we had come across so far very few references to India by standard writers on Communism. We are indebted to the Triveni for the information that Karl Marx wrote largely on India in his early journalistic days. The October number of Triveni publishes an informing review of a book by B. P. L. and Freda Bedi in which they have collected all Marx's writings on India. These articles, or letters as Marx himself called them, writes Triveni, were written by Marx as the London correspondent of the New York Daily Tribune in 1853. There are references to India in Marx's "Capital" and in his correspondence with Engels. The articles or letters collected in this book were published some years ago by a London publisher but the volume is now out of print. The following passage which Dr. Krishna, who reviews the book in Triveni, quotes, sums up Marx's view of British rule in India: "England fulfilled a double mission in India, one destructive, the other regenerating—the annihilation of old Asiatic society and the laying of the material foundation of Western society in Asia. The destructive side of the social revolution was completed in so far as her interests demanded it. The work of regeneration hardly transpires through a heap of ruins." Karl Marx was not an admirer of the village community. According to him, the village community was the solid foundation of oriental despotism. Dr. Krishna points out that the book is not a complete collection. Marx's articles on the Indian Mutiny and the Land Revenue System are omitted.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, November 4, 1939.

THE INDIA DEBATE.

The outstanding feature of the debate in the House of Commons on the White Paper on India, containing the Viceroy's statement on the position of India in relation to the War, was the speech with which Mr. Wedgwood Benn, who was Secretary of State for India in the second Labour Cabinet, opened it. It was a pronouncement characterised not only by high statesmanship but also by a sympathetic appreciation of the idealistic aspect of Indian nationalism. At the outset Mr. Benn recalled the important services rendered by India during the last war. In men, money and material India's contribution far exceeded that of any of the Dominions. India's contribution to the last War was acknowledged at the time, but has since been completely ignored. Neither in Mr. Lloyd George's "War Memoirs" nor in Mr. Winston Churchill's "World Crisis"—two authoritative works written by men who had a dominant part in the direction of the last War —is there more than a casual reference to India's services. Mr. Lloyd George does not think it worth while to mention by name the Maharaja who placed £20,000 at his disposal for experimenting with a new gun which the Army experts had rejected. Mr. Wedgwood Benn's account of India's contributions must have been the first intimation which many of the members of the present House of Commons had of them. Mr. Benn then referred to the Congress demand to be assured that the freedom of India was an integral part of the objects for which Great Britain was fighting Hitlerism. He criticised the White Paper and the Viceroy's statement as evading a direct and plain answer to this reasonable request. Mr. Benn accepted Dominion Status as the goal of India, and proceeded to point out that that status was consistent with Eire observing a strict neutrality in this War. Referring to the objection on the score of minorities, Mr. Benn observed that minorities were not peculiar to India and that in South Africa they had not allowed the opposition of the British minority to prevent the grant of Dominion Status to the Union. Mr. Benn added that the racial question in South Africa has been solved by this means. So far as South African Indians are concerned, Dominion Status has not only not solved but has actually aggravated racial discrimination. Nor even as between Boer and Briton has it removed the old antagonism. General Smuts' recent success against the Boer Nationalists was entirely due to his frightening them with the consequences of the withdrawal of the protection of the British Navy if Herr Hitler decided to recover South-West Africa by force. Even in Canada, the French minority has only acquiesced in the present arrangement as the alternative, namely assimilation by the United States, would mean the destruction of its language and culture. There is danger in fostering exaggerated hopes of any reform. Prohibition in the United States might have had a better chance but for the wildly exaggerated claims made for it by its advocates. If we accept Dominion Status as a specific for communalism we are sure to encounter a violent revulsion against it when it is found, as it is likely to be, that it has no perceptible effect in allaying communal differences.

This does not mean that, if Dominion Status is otherwise regarded as desirable, it should be postponed, as the reactionaries suggest until all communities present a joint petition begging for its introduction. Such a condition was not demanded of the present Dominions and, in the case of South Africa, the rights of native Africans which were expressly reserved for Imperial protection, have been virtually surrendered to the control of the Dominion. The existence of communities each taking special pride in its own culture traditions and religions and practising and promoting them, is a basic principle of Indian polity dating from ancient times. Every successful rule in this country, whatever the race or religion of the ruler, has accepted it as its own. Whenever this principle has been departed from, the consequences have been both swift and decisive. Communal electorates are not wrong in themselves. What is wrong is that there should be weightages given to some communities at the expense of others. Joint electorates will be beneficial to minorities, as it will be possible for the latter to secure more than their strictly proportionate number of seats which they will secure through separate electorates, with the goodwill of all communities. On this ground, joint electorates are to be preferred, but they should not be thrust upon any community against its wishes. Gandhiji has recently exposed the fiction of oppression by a majority community but unfortunately the policy of the Congress under his guidance has all along recognised and sought to negotiate settlements on the basis of this fiction. The older generation of Congress leaders resolutely set their faces against allowing communal distinctions to colour the political life of the country. And there was certainly far less communal bitterness in their day than there is between the Congress and the Muslim League at the present time.

In the ordinary course, the Under-Secretary of State for India would have been the principal spokesman of Government in the debate. But the present Under-Secretary, Sir Huge O'Neill, was, evidently considered not sufficiently important or sufficiently well-informed for the purpose. His speech towards the end of the debate did not show that his relegation to a minor role was without justification. In passing, we may enter a protest against Parliament's responsibility for India being discharged through a hermit Secretary of State in the House of Lords and an inconspicuous Under-Secretary in the House of Commons. Sir Samuel Hoare's speech following immediately after Mr. Wedgwood Benn's, was treated by all the speakers in the debate as the authoritative official statement. Misfortune has mellowed Sir Samuel's tone and manner. There was nothing of the spirit of the famous epigram about the caravan and the dogs in his speech. On the contrary, he went out of his way to be extra conciliatory by referring to Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru having been educated in the same British Public School as himself and, the First Lord of the Admiralitly, Mr. Winston Churchill. Sir Samuel pointed out at some length that the Viceroy's statement was capable of a more liberal interpretation than the one it bore on the surface. He expressed the readiness of His Majesty's Government to consider suggestions to be adopted immediately, leaving the larger question to be deliberated at the end of the war. He endorsed Mr. Wedgwood Benn's reference to the Balfour definition of Dominion Status at the 1926 Imperial Conference. But he differed from Mr. Benn in an essential particular. Mr. Benn thought Dominion Status would solve the communal question. Sir Samuel, on the other hand, held that settlement of communal differences should precede the advent of Dominion Status. Dominion Status, in Sir Samuel's view, is not a thing to be granted. It should come as the result of the complete elimition of all differences. His words are worth quoting:

> Dominion Status is not a prize that is given to a deserving community but is the recognition of the facts that actually exist.

This definition does not fit in with the circumstances in which Canada, South Africa, much less Eire, acquired Dominion Status. The only interpretation that can be put upon it in the light of these precedents, is that Dominion Status is given only when it is made sufficiently clear that it can not be withheld. Only on one issue can such a state of things at present be brought about in this country. It is that foreign rule is intolerable as such whatever its merits and achievements. The logical solution of this issue, however, is not Dominion Status but Independence. Sir Samuel Hoare's advice virtually, therefore, means a snub to those who strive to achieve India's world destiny within the British connection and a direct encouragement to those who have set before themselves the achievement of complete independence.

As has often happened before, Thursday's debate on the Indian question in the House of Lords touched a much higher level than the debates in the Commons. Viscount Samuel, the Liberal leader, initiated the debate in a speech which dispensed with the euphemisms and circumlocutions which have become conventional in debates on India in Parliament. He bluntly charged His Majesty's Government of virtually giving the Muslims, who formed one-fourth of the population, a veto on constitutional reforms desired by the Hindus who were three-fourths of it. We, for one, would be glad if the British Government actually granted it to them instead of dangling it before them in the same way as they dangle Dominion Status before other Indian politicians.

SILENCE AND SPEECH.

(By Bacon Junior.)

In the current issue of Harijan, Gandhiji has an article on "The Virtues of Silence." It is written in answer to an admirer who called on Gandhiji on one of his days of silence and was rewarded with a pencilled slip, "This has become a health necessity to me." The recipient thereupon wanted to know from Gandhiji whether there was any visible drop of blood pressure, whether after a period of silence Gandhiji felt physically better and able to put forth greater energy and application to his work and whether he felt mental recuperation also pari passu with that of his body while he is observing silence.

Gandhiji prefaces his answers to the questions with a brief note on his personal background. He writes:

> For me silence is no strain and no effort. Indeed I am so tired of arguing and talking that I speak only when I feel I must. Generally, therefore, I am nowadays silent except to visitors who come by appointment and on some business connected with activities with which I am identified. In the Segaon Ashram I am silent to everybody except in cases of sickness and the like. I observe too that I get easily irritated if members of the Ashrama act contrary to expectation. I find that silence avoids irritation.

In a normal family there is no occasion for much speaking. The members understand each other perfectly and the household routine moves by its own momentum. Except in the case of newcomers, the presence of servants does not make any difference. The reign of silence is vastly promoted by the possession by the members of a family of the reading habit. An adequate supply of books is all that is needed to keep every one absorbed and silent. There is, of course, the risk of reading leading to discussion and discussion to differences of opinion, which are often held and defended with a tenacity which may strike a stranger as altogether out of place. But people who differ on questions which do not concern themselves personally, are generally proficient in the blessed art of "agreeing to differ." The possibility of a member of the family doing anything contrary to expectation and thus causing irritation is very slight. In the Segaon Ashram, too, it can be considerably reduced by adjusting expectations to probabilities. Or the Ashramites may be accorded unrestricted freedom of self-expression as is apparently done at Santiniketan. In any case, there should be no irritation nor the need to overcome it by enforced silence. Irritation is a subjective condition and is very little dependent on the action of others. It will manifest itself wherever it exists even if every one acts according to plan. In fact the very conformity may get on frayed nerves. Where there is inward peace the most violent departure from propriety by others, is powerless to cause irritation. The classic example is Socrates' placid behaviour when Xantippe emptied on his head a pail of dirty water what time he stood under her balcony discussing philosophy with a circle of disciples.

Gandhiji with his usual perspicacity speaks of the "virtues of silence" and not of the "virtue of silence." Silence itself is not a virtue or the dumb would be the most virtuous people. The exaltation of silence to the level of a cardinal virtue is a form of asceticism which is sometimes secured by passing a long pin through both cheeks or by catching the lips with an iron clip. Ordinarily, silence is enjoined on Indian youth from early age as a matter of expediency. Maunum sarvarta sadhakam — silence serves all purposes. Silence puts the fool on the same level as the wisest of men. The saying, "Speech is silver; silence is golden," conveys a juster appreciation of the respective values of the two. Silver is suitable for some purposes and gold for others. As St. Paul says there is a time for speech and a time for silence. Sometimes indeed it is a crime and a sin not to speak out. Hear the Psalmist:

"I have preached righteousness in the great congregation; lo, I have not refrained my lips, O Lord, thou knowest."

Silence after all is a negative quality. "The evil is null, is nought," proclaims Abt Vogler, "is silence implying sound." The value of silence is wholly due to its implications in sound. A word spoken a year ago would have turned the course of history. If President Benes had said the word when the Russian Ambassador asked him on the fateful night of September, what he would like Russia to do if the French failed to come to the help of Czechoslovakia, there would perhaps have been no need today to create a paper State of that name in Paris or London. As for the therapeutic value of silence, Gandhiji points out that enforced silence is one of the greatest hardships of prison life to the average inmate. Unless one likes to be silent, he says, it will not have the beneficial effects which it has in his own case. These effects are in his own words:

> (1) There is a perceptible drop in blood pressure when observing silence. Medical friends have, therefore, advised me to take as much silence as I can.
> (2) There is no doubt whatsoever that after every silence I feel recuperated and have greater energy for work. The output of work during silence is much greater than when I am not silent.
> (3) The mind enjoys a peace during silence which it does not without it. That is to say, the decision to be silent itself produces a soothing effect on me. It lifts a burden off my mind. My experience tells me that silence soothes the nerves in a manner no drugs can. With me it also induces sleep.

Gandhiji, of course, is the best authority on his own experience, and he expressly cautions others from trying to imitate him blindly. One obvious reason for caution lies on the surface. It is the age factor. To a lad of seven, the virtues of shouting are greater than those of silence to a man of seventy. Even for older people a "good cry" is sometimes the best relief from emotional strain. On a matter of this kind, the saying holds that at forty every man is either a fool or a physician. Some experienced doctors have no faith in "blood pressure." Unduly high or low blood pressure may be better inferred from disinclination to talk than by the elaborate instrument of canvas and steel. When a man feels disinclined to talk it is Nature's warning that he had not better talk, and one will be wise to heed it. It is also both hygienically and spiritually sound to observe silence when one has nothing to say. Silence is a virtue only when speech will be either foolish or futile. It was accounted a virtue in the German Field Marshal Moltke that he could be silent in seven languages. Perhaps if he had known only his own language he would not have cultivated reticence to so high a pitch. Undoubtedly there is too much talking especially on the part of those who have little to say. But there is also too much refraining from talking by those whose duty it is to speak out. Freedom of speech is a mere shibboleth when those who think refuse to speak and those who merely echo catchwords refuse to be silent.

THE POLITICAL IMBROGLIO AND THE WAY OUT.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

Virginia Wolf in "Three Guineas" says that five words in Greek of Antigone in the 'Antigone' of Sophocles contain a far more profound statement of the duties of the individual to society than any of the sociologists can offer us and are worth all the sermons of all the archbishops. Although I know no Greek, I would respectfully add, they are worth more than all Gandhiji's explanations of Satyagraha. The words have been translated as meaning, 'It is not my nature to join in hating, but in loving.' That was written more than two thousand years ago but politicians are still repeating, in effect, Creon's answer to her, 'Pass then to the world of the dead and if thou must needs love, love them.'

If love had been the basis of international relations, tens of thousands of orphans and widows would not be sending up dumb cries to high Heaven, to be echoed I do not know by how many thousands or millions before peace is re-established in the world. And if love suffused the relationships of the Congress and the British Government, the great turmoil for which the stage has already been set, could not happen.

Whether a Saint who believes in absolute non-violence, should lead and guide an army of Congress soldiers, who, he admits, do not follow that creed, it is for Gandhiji to decide. It appears to be a case of mental confusion, as his sincerity and saintliness are both patent.

When a person has no axe to grind, private communal or party, he perceives both sides of a question. Although he might be beating his solitary drum in a desert place or sitting all alone on his cross-bench, nevertheless if suggestions are made on account of intellectual (alas, not spiritual) acceptance of Antigone's creed which is the same as what Jesus Christ and others have enunciated, the tolerant pages of the Social Reformer would, it is hoped, allow space for them.

There is the further claim that if these suggestions which are being made for ten years past, had been taken up by responsible leaders, it is quite certain that the present difficulties would not have arisen. I think I have said previously that, besides sending my views to nearly 120 leaders in England and India (this was before the Round Table Conference), I had sent personal letters to Lord Linlithgow, Sir Malcolm (now Lord) Hailey, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, the Rt. Hon'ble Srinivasa Sastry and some others. From their replies I gathered the impression that the present Viceroy and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru differed from my views, whereas Lord Hailey and Mr. Sastry considered them to be inexpedient. Subsequent events have proved the fact that they were not so inexpedient. A clear exposition of facts as they exist, if appreciated and followed, would often prevent subsequent difficulties.

Before very briefly explaining once again the actual position as I have perceived it for many years past, let me say a word more about the tangle of the moment.

If Congress Satyagraha leads to opposition to war even in self-defence—as it would seem to lead in the opinion of lay men—the Congress High Command would have been quite justified to express the view that Congress Ministries could take no part or share in the war. The same result follows if they do not mind who wins seeing that some of them have a strong leaning towards Russia, which is now friendly to Germany. Ordinary decency of political behaviour would in such circumstances also have led these Ministries to resign and stand aside, without obstructing others who believed in the use of force and in the victory of the Allies in certain circumstances, and these others would similarly have respected the conscientious scruples of Congressmen and refrained from insisting on their taking any active share in the prosecution of the war. As this is not the view of the Congress and as they definitely desire the downfall of Hitlerism, it follows that statesmanship of an altruistic type requires that they should offer co-operation, but at the same time demand that the war aims as it affected India should be stated definitely in order that that co-operation might be continuous and whole-hearted. If that course had been adopted, there would be no need for Congress Ministries to resign except in circumstances which proved it impossible to carry on. On that background, the pronouncement of the Viceroy would not amount to such a circumstance. Further negotiations could be carried on until a breaking-point is reached—and that need not happen if Antigone's great principle is borne in mind on both sides.

Congress statesmanship, however, is not quite altruistic. Gandhiji's statement, as also subsequent decisions of the Congress, shows that the Congress wishes to take up a position which at present is not true to fact—viz., that that most influential political body represents the whole of India, both British India and the States, Hindus, Mahomedans and other minorities, and all political parties. In spite of declarations to the contrary, an unbiassed observer has to conclude that the Congress has taken advantage of the war in order to manoeuvre for position— i. e., to be considered as the sole party with which Britain ought to negotiate. When they are not in power in three out of eleven Provinces, and not in power anywhere in the whole of Indian India, the purely political nature of this manoeuvre could not be gainsaid. Gandhiji's pronouncements are not calculated to inspire confidence among non-Congressmen. What the Mahomedans, as also the Mahasabha Hindus, want is not protection, but the right to determine their own destiny for themselves, to protect their culture and inheritance.

The British side has also been manoeuvring; and they could urge the obvious plea of communal differences. But it seems to me that the Congress guns, in so far as they indicated that the Congress is the only body to be negotiated with, could easily have been spiked, by that aspect being ignored. It was obvious from the 52 interviews that all parties and all communities wanted self-government. It was only in names and methods that there were differences. If, instead of the elaborate statements, two or three sentences had been written down and announced, the Congress could surely have been outmanoeuvred in that aspect. It was sufficient to announce that Dominion Status on the Westminister Statute basis (which includes freedom in foreign policies and the right to separate) had always been the aim, and would be established as soon as the war is successfully over, that the method would be decided at the time in view of all the circumstances existing at that moment; and that as a first step, a Council for consultation concerning war measures would be set up at once. The Congress could not legitimately expect a deciding voice in this council because in this matter the States and, as there are three, the non-Congress provinces, are equally important and if it resigns on this issue, that step would command no support. Then again, the Congress, the States and other political parties could certainly spare men to reside at Delhi during the course of the War. Consultation with the same set of men would be more real and would lead undoubtedly to constitutional progress, whereas the method suggested by Lord Zetland will not.

Whether it is now possible to take action on these lines and prevent needless confusions and hatreds, I do not know. I can only say that what is suggested above is based on good will towards both sides.

Let me say here once again that the several points made by me during the past ten years are each of them fundamental and unassailable. Unless these points are recognized as such (leaving aside my asservations) I am unable to see how lasting peaceful progress would be possible. What the war has in store for India and the world, I do not know. I am writing in the hope that it would lead to the triumph of peace on earth and goodwill among men, that men would learn to join in loving and not in hating.

I do not know whether it is any use recapitulating those points. Judging from the trend of events, the drift appears to have set strongly towards the fulfilment of Cheiro's prophecy—viz, that India would be split up into Hindu and Mohomedan states at civil war. Whether destiny is irrevocable or shifts from day to day, there is no means of knowing. Having correctly anticipated events in the past, it is in the hope that the Congress and the Muslim League and the Hindus and the Mahomedans would give up temporrary advantages and work towards a United India in what seems to be the only manner possible that I am writing again.

In the announcement of 1917, and in subsequent pronouncements the terms India and British India were both used as if they had the same connotation, and apparently without realizing all the difficulties. This was shown elaborately in an article published in a London journal when the Round Table Conference was in session, but contributed long previously. The difficulties seem to have been appreciated subsequently, and the situation was saved through the Princes offering to enter the Federation.

It is obvious that Dominion Status is impossible except for British India and Indian India jointly and there are only two ways of achieving it. Either a Federation including both, or British India assuming the functions of the Paramount Power towards the States. The latter is the senior Nehru's scheme, but as pointed out by me at the time, it has insuperable difficulties, and is not ethically justifiable.

Six hundred and more autocratic States cannot easily be welded into a Federation with so few British Indian Provinces which are all democratically governed. Gandhiji had brought about a state of peaceful war—there is an actual war now—and the time was then opportune and would be opportune again at the end of the war so to modify the treaties as substantially to reduce the number of States as Federating Units, and also to modify the form of government in them as to make them more fit to enter into a federation with Democratic Provinces. After these changes are made, in Defence and Foreign Affairs, the States would have a share. Details were worked out in 1930, but these now require to be modified.

On account of the communal bias of Indians, the British Parliamentary form of Democracy is unsuited to India, as it is bound to lead to communal majorities being given the powers of a political majority. Read any leading article on the subject in any Indian paper, and it will be found that the writer constantly shifts from political to communal majority in the belief that both have the same rights—although it is obvious that 51 Hindus or 51 Moslems have no democratic or parliamentary right to override the opinions of 49 Mahomedans or 49 Hindus. The recent interviews on the Viceroy's statement, given by Dr. Ambedkar representing the Depressed Classes, and by Mr. Jinnah for Moslems have explicitly brought out, what I had been saying over and over again for ten years.

It shows poverty of statesmanship to abandon Democracy on the ground that parliamentary majority government is unsuited for a communally-minded country. As has been ably pointed out recently by Mr. S. Srinivas Iyengar, we are all the same race —we differ radically and are easily separable from people living in other areas. Some Punjabis and several Bengalees would easily be mistaken for Malayalees in the extreme south but not for Kaffirs or Chinese, and very seldom for Europeans. It is not difficult to devise other forms of democratic government so as to preserve our unity, and simultaneously dispel the fears of Jinnah and Ambedkar. In war, all governments tend to become all-party governments. Why should not peace be regarded as a state of war against evils which are more damaging than the act of killing each other? I have suggested various methods for killing out communalisms and abolishing hatreds while preserving democracy and there must be many other methods. Why is no one thinking of them? Could not Jinnah and Nehru agree to meet and not to part till they come to an agreement, which Ambedkar and Rajah would also accept? Is it possible to transport all Hindus from Moslem Provinces and vice versa so as to suit the ideas of some Moslem leaders?

I think I speak for all Christians and other smaller minorities that they would accept any scheme which is acceptable to Hindus and Moslems jointly and also to the Depressed Classes.

The Congress could undoubtedly give very serious trouble by starting non-co-operation; but it should not be forgotten that it is just because the British adopted a wrong system that the Congress is ruling eight Provinces and that under the system advocated by me — or in fact under any really sound federal system suited to a communal country—there would have been no High Command issuing orders to the Ministers of so-called autonomous Federal Units, Ministers who call themselves soldiers who have to obey not the voice of the electorate in their respective Provinces, but of the High Command.

Whatever happens in the future, I fervently hope that such blatant travesties of real democracy would be things of the past. The voices of Tammany Hall and of the Primrose League do undoubtedly influence politics and policies, but nowhere else in the democratic world, so far as I know, do they openly and publicly issue orders to Ministers—who do not consider themselves responsible to the legislature but to the High Command.

Let the British at least in the future refrain from taking steps whereby democratic forms would be used for serving quite other ends; and similarly it is hoped that the voters, even the Congress voters, would become sufficiently imbued with sound democracy to realize that the Premier of an autonomous unit should not resign by command, but only when he loses the confidence of the legislature, that is, of the electorate. If the world, however, is becoming unfit for democracy and fit for only one form or other of Fascism, that is another story; but let that be honestly stated and honestly faced.

people may be guided safely to a better and happier order of living.

Outside, where this civilisation has gone and spread, it has vandalised native culture; ruthlessly exploited native population, usurped their land and treasures, making them either slave or extinct altogether; destroyed peace and tranquility of atmosphere by raid and forcible penetration and devastated social happiness by infiltration of standardised ideas and customs foreign to and unsuitable to local conditions.

Such is the civilisation for the safety of which some people are crying and others are feeling duty bound to express sympathetic concern. Would it not be better for humanity, for the world, for the very people who have nursed and developed this culture and civilisation if that civilisation be destroyed and buried under the ruins of the present war? For it is not the war that is endangering the civilisation; it is the latter which is causing and leading to periodic wars. European wars are, therefore, not to be denounced as ruinous to the cause of this civilisation, but should be provocative of thought that might lead to its purification and to its establishment on higher ideals and nobler principles. The last war made some thoughtful Europeans look back and sound the foundations of the culture that Europe was rearing; but the ease, luxury, and sense of safety, which followed, diverted them back to their old ways and old thoughts. War has come again, as it was bound to come, and the danger and anxiety, which it has caused has set them thinking again. But more of such wars are necessary to batter down this civilisation, which Europe still boasts of and holds up advertisingly before the world. The ruins and destructions of such wars will only make her realise the hollowness and evil potentialities of this civilisation and culture. Through such realisation will come the wisdom to discard this civilisation and found in its place another, that will recognise the rights of all, strong or weak, coloured or white, that will denounce exploitation and colonisation, that will strive for a real universal human brotherwood and that will evolve a social order, based on strong morals and high virtues in which peace will last and happiness will endure.

CONGRESS MINISTRIES RESIGN.

The Government of Madras was first in the field to implement the decision of the Working Committee of the Congress to withdraw Congress Governments in the provinces in view of the unsatisfactory character of the response of the Viceroy and the British Government to the Congress request to be assured that the acquisition of Independence by India was implicit in the objects of the War in which she was involved along with the rest of the British Commonwealth, except Eire. The Prime Minister moved the following resolution on Thursday the 26th October in the Madras Legislative Assembly:

> This Assembly regrets that the British Government have made India a participant in the war between Great Britain and Germany without the consent of the people of India and have further in complete disregard of Indian opinion passed laws and adopted measures curtailing the powers and activities of the Provincial Governments. This Assembly recommends to the Government to convey to the Government of India and through them to the British Government that in consonance with the avowed aims of the present war, it is essential in order to secure the co-operation of the Indian people that the principles of democracy be applied to India and her policy be guided by her people, and that India should be regarded as an independent nation, entitled to frame her own constitution, and further that suitable action should be taken in so far as it is possible in the immediate present to give effect to that principle in regard to the present governance of India, including arrangements whereby all war measures in this Province may be undertaken with the consent of, and executed through, the Provincial Government. This Assembly profoundly regrets that the situation in India has not been rightly understood by His Majesty's Government when authorising the statement that has been made on their behalf in regard to India.

In reply to an objection that the resolution relating as it did to a subject not strictly provincial, required the previous permission of the Governor, the Prime Minister said that, though he did not think it necessary, he had, to make sure, obtained the permission of His Excellency for the resolution being moved in the Assembly. Mr. Rajagopalacharya struck a high note in the opening sentences of his speech. He said:—

> Indians thought and wondered how it was that suddenly our people were to be at war with another people. What has brought this about, what is it that has happened by which, we, here in India, men, women and children, are suddenly declared to be at war with another people, men, women and children, whom we had never seen before and with whom we had no immediate transaction leading up to any trouble like this?
> "We have been asked to carry out various measures of war. We have been asked to seize people if they were roaming about this country or province and put them under orders of imprisonment, separate them from their families and so on. We, therefore, are entitled as common men and women, to think whether this is right and why this has come about.
> It was true, the Prime Minister continued, that India was in a state in which all her people could be declared to be at war with another people. To-day it was Germany, to-morrow it might be Afghanistan, Tibet, China, or Japan. They would be bound under the law to arm themselves and kill and slaughter—that was really the concrete end of war. It would be well to keep this in view whenever they discussed the question. "Let us not imagine," the Prime Minister emphasised, "that war is merely news. War is actual slaughter and terrific bloodshed. Let us keep this fact before us. Whatever may the constitutional position, we are entitled to consider and examine whether there has been justifiable cause for us to be at war with other people and whether it is right for us to follow it to with action."

The late Prime Ministers of Madras is a prolix but not tiresome speaker. He likes to put the same point over and over again in various forms so as to appeal to the varied levels of his audience's intelligence. He likened the position of India to that of the bullocks yoked to a cart. They were not asked before starting a journey whether they consented to draw the cart. Supporting a War was a more serious business than drawing a cart. It is undertaking to kill and be killed. The Minister warned the Assembly that War was more than columns of news in the newspapers. The people of India, he declared, had been ordered into a psychological condition of murder and slaughter. According to the Gandhian doctrine, murder, in all circumstances, and especially mass murder known as war, is absolutely inadmissible for any reason whatsoever. But on the present occasion not even Gandhiji has pushed the doctrine to its logical limit. Gandhiji and Mr. Rajagopalacharya only asked that, before being thrown into War psychology, the people of India were entitled to be told what it was for and how it would benefit them or humanity. The opposition to the resolution was feeble. Not the most violent opponent of the Congress can maintain that it is right to drag India into a war with a distant people without informing them of the why and wherefore of it. The resolution was carried by 15 to 22. The Prime Minister immediately tendered the resignation of his cabinet to the Governor who requested him to hold office till he was able to make arrangements for the administration to be carried on. On the refusal of the leaders of the Opposition to form a Ministry the Governor assumed the administrative and legislative powers. In his Proclamation announcing this, His Excellency said :—

I have, therefore, adopted the only course that is now open to me and have issued a Proclamation under Section 93 of the Government of India Act, taking all administrative and legislative power into my own hands. This is a step that I regret profoundly but in the present circumstances it is unavoidable.

While this Proclamation remains in force the Legislature of the Province will not meet, since all its powers have been assumed to myself.

The Proclamation that has been issued remains in force for six months unless it is revoked earlier and beyond that time it may be extended by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament up to a limit of three years in all.

In the other Congress Provinces, the procedure has been more or less the same as in Madras. The Bombay Government tendered its resignation on Tuesday and has been requested by the Governor to continue until he is able to make arrangements for the administration to be carried on. The Congress majority in the Bombay Legislative Assembly is not as large as in Madras. But it is split up into three or four groups individually of small dimensions. The largest is the Muslim League group whose leader acts as the leader of the Opposition. Sir Mahomed Dehlavi was invited by His Excellency and asked if he could form a Ministry. He has taken time to consult the other groups. If he can bring the others to work with him he can put up a good show with Mr. Jamnadas Mehta and Dr. Ambedkar. But a Coalition of this type has little chance of gaining over more than one half of the Congress bloc, which it will have to do in order to command a majority. It seems likely that in Bombay and the other Congress Provinces the Governors will have to assume all powers as in Madras.

Prohibition Day Sequel :—An official summary of the report of the inquiry which Mr. Justice Broomfield, Judge of the Bombay High Court, conducted into the firing by the Bombay City Police while controlling a Muslim procession against the Urban Property Tax on August 1, has been released to the press. The report exonerates the police and, in examining the circumstances which led to the firing, makes special mention of the patience shown by the police officers in the face of grave provocation. Mr. Broomfield has given a narrative of the events of the day which would be complete but for one important omission. He does not give even the slightest hint that the Bombay Government had fixed that very day for celebrating the introduction of Prohibition. Without this the clashes between "Hindu crowds" and the Muslim processionists are likely to convey the impression that all the trouble arose out of the insensate fury of Hindu and Muslim fanatics. "The processionists," says the summary, "were in an angry mood, and their loudly expressed resentment against the Property Tax had a definitely communal character, owing to the fact that it had been imposed by a Congress Government." (There is no logical sequence in this argument.) "They shouted slogans of an abusive and often indecent nature about Hindus in general and Congress Ministers in particular.....Provocation was undoubtedly given by Hindu crowds. It is possible that it was the Hindus who first started throwing stones." All this gives an entirely wrong impression, in the absence of an explanation as to why "Hindu crowds"—would it not be more correct to say Government supporters?—had in the first place collected. One cause of it was the declaration of August 1 as a public holiday and the Government decision to celebrate the inauguration of Prohibition with a procession and a public meeting. So obviously was the rioting taken to be one between Government supporters and opponents that while the Muslim processionists and the Muslim League which opposed the Urban Property Tax were both represented by counsel, there was no Hindu communal organisation represented at the inquiry. The Muslim procession was, as the summary report says, a protest against the Urban Tax. But it would not have been staged but for the wholly unnecessary Prohibition demonstrations of the Government. Even had it been organised, it would not have created much stir in the city.

Liberals Querulous :—The statement issued by the Council of the Liberal Federation is a querulous document and seems to have been composed with no definite object in view. Thus, it complains that the Viceroy's statement does not make it clear that the Dominion Status to be attained by India is to be of the same character as that enjoyed by the present Dominions and as is contemplated by the Statute of Westminister. Dominion Status is now defined in a Statute and must be taken to mean one and the same thing whether with reference to India or to any other country. If it was intended that the Dominion Status of India was to be of a different kind, it should have been so stated in the Viceroy's statement. In the absence of any such qualification there is no ground for suspecting that Lord Linlithgow has in view some special kind of Dominion Status for India. Sir Samuel Hoare made this clear in his speech on Thursday. The Council of the Federation complains that no date has been definitely fixed for the introduction of Dominion Status. The time indicated is as soon as possible at the end of the War and unless the Council can prophecy when this War will end and that it will not be succeeded by another War, it is obviously out of the question for the Viceroy or anybody else, to fix a date. Apropos of this difficulty, the scene between Lord Halifax and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru on the closing day of the Joint Parliamentary Committee, will be fresh in the minds of readers. Sir Tej referring to the statement made by Lord Halifax as Viceroy to which Lord Linlithgow also refers, asked for a date for the introduction of Dominion Status. Lord Halifax observed that, though he had said that Dominion Status was the goal, he had said nothing to imply that it would be attained soon. Whereupon Sir Tej left the Committee room after protesting that, if that was Lord Halifax's interpretation of the pledge, he for one would have nothing more to do with it. The Council of the Federation also complains of the omission to say anything about the Indianisation of the Army in the Viceroy's statement. Dominion Status certainly includes complete Indianisation. When one makes a death-bed gift of a cow to a Brahmin, one does not say that one gives also its tail and its horns and its hoofs. The Council points out as we did that it is a travesty of the fact to say that the Hoare constitution was framed in joint consultation by Indian and British statesmen.

Independence and Mr. Ganguli :—Mr. J. M. Ganguli rebukes those who would dilute their passion for Indian independence with a desire for security and a fear of aggression. In view of the enthusiasm with which so many of our patriots have shown their readiness to exchange their declared ideal of Independence for a promise of Dominion Status to be fulfilled after the present war or even for immediate Dominionhood, his rebuke is clearly justified. If it is argued that Dominion Status is Independence, then it is pertinent to ask why Indian politicians of a certain class raised the slogan of Independence and set it up as a barrier against other Indians who worked for Dominion Status. Mr. Ganguli's reference to the Chinese thinker, Chuang Tsi, is a very appropriate one but his application of it is incorrect. Chuang Tsi's refusal to accede to the request of his King would have been wise and exemplary had the position offered to him been that of a Pompadour or a Court Jester. But when he was offered the Prime Ministership, the position of the highest responsibility in the State, it is, to say the least, irresponsible and selfish to prefer to "wag his tail in the mud." Deliberately to cast aside a position in which one can serve one's fellowmen, where one can temper imperial policy with clemency and justice, is a rejection of power which can have little to commend it. In the absence of information as to Chuang Tsi's previous experience of the premiership, one can only conclude that Tsi was choosing personal security in preference to the public good. The Indian position is similar. Indian independence is desired not that India might retire into isolation within the Himalayas and the three seas but that she might play a fuller part in the councils of the world. If she can do this in and through the present system in which she finds herself — if she, in the words of the story, is offered "the premiership of the Empire" — she would be foolish to prefer "wagging her tail in the mud." That is the goal we would suggest to Indian statesmen rather than an insistence on some nebulous, "Dominion Status" which, at its best, can only mean a position of one among many other nations of the Commonwealth.

Totalitarian Economics and the Classless Society :—Mr. Cyril Modak in the article which we publish this week, remarks, "It is now as good as an axiom that only a classless society can liquidate poverty by placing the national wealth at the disposal of the community." There is a measure of ambiguity about this sentence which is intensified by the arguments employed later on. We are not sure whether Mr. Modak sets forth a case for an acceptance of the elementary economic rights of man or for the economic equality of men. His remarks on "a classless society" and the references to capitalism and private property would imply the latter; while his mention of the sufferings of the poor in the present system suggest the first. We agree with Mr. Modak that political democracy and equal citizenship in a State can only exist along with economic sufficiency. But if we are to wait for a classless society for a solution of the problems of poverty, there is small chance of attaining our objectives. When the State has abolished all economic differences between man and man—itself an impossible achievement—there will be other distinctions which assume greater significance. The Government official has advantages over the ordinary party member; the party man lords it over the rest of the population. Economic inequality gives place to social inequality; class to caste. The army is an organisation which ignores economic worth. "A wealthy soldier," writes Mr. Priestley, "might buy a little promotion but that is all. But there is a tremendous difference between what a private is allowed to do and what a general is allowed to do." Mr. Modak is not correct, generally speaking, in asserting that untouchables have been able to get over their disabilities through wealth. It has invariably been found that economic distinctions have been superimposed on caste distinctions. The caste system in India and racialism abroad have shown that social privilege is more galling in its working than economic inequality, once an economic minimum is attained.

Mr. P. Joseph on Journalism :—The address which Mr. Pothan Joseph, Editor of the Indian Express of Madras, delivered as President of the Andhra Journalists' Conference held at Ellore last week, was characteristically frank and free from cant. His recommendation that reports of speeches should be compressed is one which should be observed in the interests not only of newspaper readers but also, if no more, in the interests of the speakers themselves. Very few speakers at public meetings or legislative bodies deserve to be reported verbatim. Apart from that, speaking involves much repetition and illustration in parables and stories, which are out of place and tiresome in print. An experienced public man once told this writer the secret of his success as a speaker. He usually spoke for forty minutes at the longest, he said. In the first twenty minutes he exhausted all he had to say and devoted the next twenty to going over the same ground with the object of ramming his ideas into the minds of his hearers. It is obvious that in this gentleman's case the reporter need only take down what he says in the first twenty minutes.

For the rest of the speech, he can sit back in his chair and rest. We agree with Mr. Joseph that, notwithstanding the zealous efforts that are being made to oust English in favour of a national language still in the making, English will be necessary as the medium of all India journalism and that we should not be too much in a hurry to get rid of it. We may add that if we must write in English it is worth while writing it well. Writing or speaking bad English is not a sign of patriotism. It may be a kind of patriotism to eschew a foreign language altogether but not to murder it deliberately. There is a distinct decline in the number of good writers of English though the number of newspapers written in English is on the increase. Mr. Joseph's advice to Indian journalists not to regard themselves as inferior to any other professional because of their small and precarious emoluments is very timely. Not less so was his admonition against the Journalist degenerating into a party hack. If the journalist has a poor opinion of his vocation, he can not expect the public to have a higher opinion of it. Mr. Joseph complained of the working of the Press Censorship instituted since the outbreak of the war in Madras. There has been no occasion for similar complaints here but we agree that if the Censorship is abolished the course of the war would in no wise be impeded. There is so very little of real news about the war that is available to newspapers even in Great Britain that there is no fear of its publication prejudicing the interests of any of the belligerents, least of all, of Britain.

The Turko-British Treaty :—The conclusion of a treaty of mutual assistance between Turkey and Britain has been hailed as a triumph of British diplomacy. So it is. The relations between the two countries during and for several years after the last war, were not such as to leave many friendly recollections. The visit of King Edward VIII, now the Duke of Windsor, to the late Kemal Ataturk, four years ago was the first gesture of friendship on the part of a high British personage since the birth of New Turkey. The policy then initiated by the Duke has now borne fruit. The Treaty with Turkey will be welcomed in this country where the death of Ataturk evoked demonstrations of admiration. The news which closely followed that of the conclusion of the Treaty, namely, that Britain had promised a huge credit caused some uneasiness. A business friend murmured, on reading it, Shakespeare's warning that a loan loses both itself and friend. This has since been contradicted officially from London and so the uneasiness on that account may be dismissed. Italy, however, is said to regard the Anglo-Turkish friendship with suspicion but surely she also can be friends with both Britain and Turkey if she has no sinister aims in view against either of them.

Russia in Poland :—When Russia moved its troops into Poland in the middle of last month, the British Prime Minister told the House of Commons that he wanted time to understand the implications of the act. But subsequent events made it clear that Russia had not taken the step to protect Poland from being overrun by Germany. Russia quietly proceeded to establish the Soviet system in the territories which she took over. Soon after the details of the partition of the country between the Nazi and Soviet Powers was announced. According to the strict letter of the Anglo-Polish Treaty, Great Britain was under obligation to defend Poland against aggression by a European Power. Mussolini pointed out that Britain's failure to declare war against Russia detracted from her moral claim in the war against Germany. It appears, however, that when the Anglo-Polish Treaty was signed it was understood by both the contracting parties, that only aggression by Germany was meant by the phrase, "aggression by a European Power." The Prime Minister made this announcement in Parliament this week. Reservations in favour of particular nations are not uncommon in mutual defence treaties. In the Triple Alliance, Italy made a reservation that she would not fight Great Britain. In the Anglo-Turkish Treaty concluded last week, Turkey has made a reservation in favour of her proved friend and protector, Soviet Russia. But the restriction of a general expression like "a European Power" to one particular Power, is a novel feature.

India in Parliament :—Only the briefest notice is possible in this week's Reformer of the debate in the House of Commons on Thursday on the Labour resolution on the Viceroy's recent statement. The reports of the speeches of Mr. Wedgewood Benn who initiated the debate and Sir Samuel Hoare who followed him in the morning papers on Friday are incomplete. The tone particularly of the latter's speech as summarised in the British Broadcast summary last night, is markedly different in an important respect from that of the incomplete report of his speech. The speech of the Under Secretary of State for India, who is the official representative of the India Office, has not been reported on Friday morning. The British Broadcast summary of it contained one important sentence that the White Paper (the Viceroy's statement) had no finality about it. In these circumstances, it is best to postpone comment on the debate till next week. But we must say this : that it will be a sight for gods and men if when Great Britain is fighting Hitlerism in Europe, it should be practising it in India against the Congress even should it find itself forced into non-co-operation by circumstances beyond its control. So far as we know, none of the leaders now in control of the movement wants to start it during the pendency of the War. But just as the British Government which did not want war has been forced into it, Congress leaders may find themselves forced into a course which they do not contemplate. Then will be the testing time for both Indian and British character and statesmanship.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, October 28, 1939.

IN THE MELTING POT.

When the Congress decided to accept office two and a half years ago with the professed object of wrecking the new constitution, it was strictly following British precedents. The most important of them all is that set by Oliver Cromwell whose procedure, with the single exception of Pride's Purge, adhered meticulously to the law of the British constitution. Even the trial, condemnation and execution of King Charles I was carried out with scrupulous regard for legal forms. The Congress, having won a majority of seats in the Legislature in seven provinces on the franchise laid down by the Government of India Act and the rules under it, claimed that it alone represented the people in these provinces. Having regard to the illiteracy, ignorance and apathy of the masses this was a large claim. But it was not open to the Government to contest it because it had itself prescribed the method of representation. In order to preserve a semblance of continuity with election declarations, Congressmen said, and no doubt believed, that they were accepting office with a view to wreck the Hoare constitution. But Congress Ministers soon became enamoured of their work, and forgot all about the wrecking programme. Prohibition, education, relief of the peasantry from debt, temple entry for untouchables, industrial planning and other measures which required a long period in office to carry through, were undertaken without the least thought that they may have to be dropped midstream uncompleted. Not only that but, on one or two occasions within a few months of their taking office, when the wrecking objective was still fresh in their minds, Congress leaders deliberately accepted solutions of a face-saving character on issues which, if they had cared, might have been utilised for creating deadlocks. But the War situation has forced their hands. The earlier Wardha resolution was clearly intended to give the British Government an opportunity for making some gesture which might be interpreted as satisfying Congress claims. The categorical, not to say contemptuous, refusal of Lord Zetland to make any sign which can even remotely convey the impression that the British Government had a conciliatory purpose in view, was certainly a surprise and a snub to Congress leaders which not the most forbearing of them could acquiescence in. There was indeed little purpose in holding the interviews with the Viceroy if nothing better than Lord Zetland's admonitions were contemplated. That there are numerous minorities in the country, real and fanciful, needed no confirmation. It is bad policy to raise hopes when you have no intention of fulfilling them. Lord Zetland's pronouncements which reflect the views of His Majesty's Government, left not an inch of ground on which Congress leaders may frame a formula that would enable them to continue in office. The Working Committee resolution which we publish elsewhere was practically forced on the Congress by His Majesty's Government. If Congress Governments continue to hold office in spite of this slap in their faces, they would completely forfeit the respect of the public not only in India but also in Great Britain. Gandhiji has said that it would have been better if the Viceroy's statement had not been issued. But the earlier Wardha resolution demanded an answer and, if there was none there would have been the complaint that Government had not the courtesy to notice the demand of the largest political organisation in the country. Silence, too, it would have been said meant nothing less than refusal. If the Congress had not passed the earlier resolution there would have been no occasion for the Viceroy to make his statement. The resignation of the Congress Ministries will clear the political atmosphere and it will be possible to know who stands for what. The confusion between "wrecking" and "working" will be at an end. As a matter of fact the Congress objective of wrecking has been fulfilled in spite of itself by world events. First the Federal and then the provincial part of the Hoare scheme have gone by the board. We have now a clean slate and may proceed to write on it on clean lines.

The resolution of the Muslim League Working Committee which also we publish elsewhere, is a masterpiece in the art of temporising. The League is as much wedded to Independence as the goal of Indian politics as the Congress. To the Congress Independence means the transfer of the control of the government from British to Indian hands. To the Muslim League under Mr. Jinnah's dispensation, it means something more. It means first the suppression of the Hindu influence in any shape or form. Hence objects even to the renaissance and revival movements which began at the beginning of the last century. The fear of the Hindu majority is a political fiction. The Hindus are divided into numerous castes and sects whom only a common and severe persecution has ever united in self-defence. When the danger was past the castes and sects resumed their normal isolation. Sir K. V. Reddi, Mr. M. C. Rajah and Dr. Ambedkar had requested Mr. Jinnah the other day to represent their interests along with those of members of his League to the Viceroy. The first two had also sent a representation invoking the help of the Government of India to put down the vile machinations by which Brahmins who forming only 3 per cent of the population of the Madras province, had managed to secure a fourth of the seats in the provincial Legislature. Strange to say, the strongest protest against the action of the non-Brahmin leaders has come from a Muslim, once himself a leader of the Justice party, Sir Mahomed Usman. If Mr.

Jinnah would widen the basis of his League and call it a Justice League he will find a number of adherents from among the leaders of the now defunct party. Another myth of Mr. Jinnah's is that the Hindu majority has for its main object the oppression of Muslims. On this question, history speaks with no uncertain voice and we may expect those who aspire to be the rulers of India to make themselves acquainted with Indian history. We are no more enamoured of the rule of the majority than is Mr. Jinnah. So far as democracy means nothing more than rule of the majority, we care for it as little as he does. But in the course of history, Democracy has gathered around itself associations which, in the eyes of thinking people, are far more essential to it than mere numbers. This qualitative essence of democracy is freedom, the most fundamental of which is freedom of conscience. Any form of Government which ensures to citizens complete freedom of conscience, is superior to any other which does not do this even if it go by the name of and exhibit the forms of democracy. Since the above was written, we have come across a statement of his views furnished by Mr. Jinnah to the Manchester Guardian. Its ideology cannot but strike English readers of that Liberal journal as having more affinity to that which they are fighting to destroy than to that which they are fighting to preserve in Europe.

MYSORE'S ECONOMIC POLICY.

(By A. Padmanabha Iyar.)

The address delivered by Sir Mirza Ismail, the popular and talented Dewan of Mysore, to the members of the Dasara Session of the Representative Assembly, is an illumunating document in several ways. The key-note of Mysore Administration, especially during the last thirteen years of his Dewanship, has been to enhance the prosperity and happiness of the rural population and thus to raise the economic efficiency generally of the people. The present Address also contains ample proof of the remarkable success of this endeavour of Government.

The mere enumeration of the industries started and worked during the last decade and three years is enough to show how the State has been made self-sufficient in the matter of its own requirements of every day's use. Iron and steel, sugar, silk, silk filature, waste silk, cement, paper, ceramic, electrical, pharmaceutical, soap, sandalwood oil, tobacco and other industries now flourishing in the State, form a record of which any administration may feel legitimately proud as a noble achievement of an industrial policy conceived with courage and executed with admirable vigour, with results which have been pronounced strikingly successful. In addition to all these the Dewan announces that it has been decided to start at Hassan a factory for the manufacture of tools and agricultural implements. The general complaint everywhere in India which, it is admitted, is a purely agricultural country, is that the scientific methods suggested and the improved implements introduced do not appeal to the ryot population because their foreign make does not appeal to them and that difficulties arise in the matter of repair. The idea, therefore, of establishing a factory for manufacturing tools and agricultural implements is admirable and is in accord with the policy of the State to make the rural population happy and prosperous. This is only another convenience afforded to the agriculturist in addition to the facilities in the way of irrigation, remission of land tax, etc. It is further announced that the Mysore Vegetable Oil Products Co., the Mysore Silk Filatures, and the Mysore Glass and Enamel Works have started operations, while the Mysore Chemicals and Fertilizers and the Mysore Coffee Curing Works, are expected to function shortly. All these are admirably conceived to increase the output of local products and afford employment to a large section of Mysoreans, which itself is an important factor in the economic salvation of the State. The Government Lac and Paint Factory which started working only in November last, has already begun to supply the requirements of the Mysore State Railway and the Public Works Departments. It is highly satisfactory to know that these products are very popular in the local markets. The Mysore Tannery is being placed on a sound joint-stock basis and similar attempts are being made in the case of the Match Factory at Shimoga.

It is seen that the total number of large-scale industries in the State is at present thirty. While liberal State-aid is granted to large-scale industries, Government have not forgotten their responsibility in the matter of cottage and rural industries. Consistently with the well-planned and carefully carried out programme of Rural Reconstruction the Government are equally zealous to afford all facilities to promote cottage and rural industries which are the life-blood of the masses. It is in this way that the general standard of living among the rural population is raised. The Dewan says that "this is the pivot of our policy of rural reconstruction." The Government have, it will be remembered, carried out in action what they have been stating on paper. About three years ago the Government ordered a careful survey to be made of the immediate possibilities of carrying on rural reconstruction work and selected a certain number of villages. Intensive work was carried out in about 200 villages. Since then another three-year plan has been sanctioned for the development of rural industries, involving an expenditure of Rs. 1¼ lakhs. In as many as thirty-five centres such village industries as smithies, tanning, leather work, improved pottery and coir manufactures, mat-weaving, paper-making, oilseed-crushing and tile-making have been established. Mysore products are now attracting attention both in and outside the State. Local manufacturers of art-ware, etc., have been enabled to find a steady market for their products by the organisation of show and sale rooms at important commercial centres.

In regard to the large-scale industries like the Mysore Iron and Steel Works also, their operations have yielded very good result. It is highly gratifying that for the first time since the establishment of the Iron and Steel Works at Bhadravati they have yielded a surplus of Rs. 2½ lakhs which covers the entire depreciation on the plant. The Mysore Paper Mills which started operations only about a couple of years ago has been able to throw on the market several kinds of paper made of bamboo pulp. The quality of the paper has been widely appreciated. The Mills have been making a special variety of paper at prices which compare favourably with the present prices of newsprint. They are also investigating the possibility of making mechanical pulp from local woods. In the course of his broadcast talk on Mysore on the 5th August last year, the Dewan observed thus:—

> "We are very proud of the products of these factories, and at the risk of being called provincial, try to set before all true Mysoreans the ideal that they should wash themselves with Mysore soap, dry themselves with Mysore towels, clothe themselves in Mysore Silks ride Mysore horses, eat the abundant Mysore food, drink Mysore coffee with Mysore sugar, build their homes with Mysore cement, Mysore timber and Mysore steel, furnish their houses with Mysore furniture and write their letters on Mysore paper."

This hope of the Dewan has been realised and Mysore stands today a model for other administrations to follow in an industrial policy which has yielded such magnificent results.

FRUITS OF IMPERIALIST PROPAGANDA.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

One of the principal help-mates of Imperialism is propaganda, propaganda directed to hold up to advantage the culture and qualities of the Imperialists on the one side, and to belittle correspondingly those of the people subjugated on the other. The effect of such contrasting propaganda is to make the ruled people lose confidence in themselves and in their institutions, and to make them idolise and follow their political masters. Such imperialistic propaganda also instills the idea into the mind of the subject people, from their early age, that they cannot stand by themselves and cannot defend their country against foreign aggression, without the help and protection of their benevolent rulers, before whose advent their conditions were miserable and after whose departure—if such departure be contemplated—the condition of their country would be worse and frightful. To give colour to this propaganda the bogey of invasion by hungry, ferocious people from outside is held up, and different communities in the country itself fighting for advantage are pictured. In the case of Christian Imperial powers, the Christian missionaries, who receive State help and patronage, very usefully back up the Imperial propaganda and spread it among the masses by attacking their culture and ridiculing their social customs and traditions and in other subtle ways.

The influence of such penetrating propaganda is that the people of those countries grow up weak and diffident, neglecting and disdaining their own culture and heritage, and looking helplessly for guidance, protection and inspiration to their rulers. Disarmed by law, emasculated by faulty training and education, weakened by lack of self-confidence, and uninspired by a spirit of self-assertiveness, they resign themselves to their lot, and think of no more than to live the span of their life unstarved and with a sense of physical security from outside. To be left free in the sunshine of liberty frightens them as it frightens a bird caged for years. Those of them who are in the enjoyment of some economic comfort and prosperity, are all the more scared by the idea of their country's independence which might entail an upsetting of existing conditions, which have suited them.

To what an extent India has been thus affected becomes apparent now and then from the mentality of its people. It is said that Britons prayed to the departing Romans not to leave England but to continue to rule over them. Here in this country also, which, unlike the land of the Britons, has had a glorious past, a great culture, noble heritage and a flourishing independent existence, the people have so broken down during only a few centuries of lost independence that they fight shy of an independent status, and like Britons can only think of praying for being ever kept in dependence. During the last war, when the German warship, Emden, was raiding in the Bay of Bengal, an English judge of the Calcutta High Court asked the late Dr. Rash Behari Ghose what he thought he (meaning he and his countrymen) would do if the Emden were to come up the Hoogly to Outram Ghat in Calcutta. The ready-witted great lawyer promptly replied that they would go to the Ghat and present a loyal address of welcome to the raiders. What else had they been taught to do during the last one hundred and fifty years and more,—pertinently asked Dr. Ghose in support of his remark.

A more realistic picture of the conditions in the country could scarcely have been given in so few words. Not to say of the masses, who generally lie embedded in the present and lack the vision and courage to look into the future with ambition, our educated people also are without an expansive outlook and can only think of an existence sheltered and protected by others, whatever such shelter and protection may mean and cost. Whenever there is a war, and the danger of foreign attack is held up for enlisting public help and support to the war cause, so many of the educated people begin to shake with fear. Some shudder to think, "If Hitler succeeds and England goes under—which God forbid—there would be an end, within a few months, of India's security." The terror that would overtake India is 'unthinkable' to them. Others ask those Congress leaders, who have openly conceived the independence idea, to think of the condition of Poland. The long years of Imperialistic propaganda and the demoralising effects of centuries of dependence have so completely eaten up the vitals of their manhood that even in imagination they shrink in fear at the prospect of having to defend themselves their own home and hearth, and to suffer and die in so doing. It is this timidity that makes them think not of self-help but only of appealing even up to the Privy Council when even their wives are snatched away from their side by a ruffian, as has been written in a well-known book by that great, thoughtful writer Amritalal Bose. That nothing great and glorious can be achieved without suffering and sacrifice at the outset, they forget in their state of nervousness. That no nation has risen and prospered in a state of dependence on others, they would not realise. Even in the education of children repression is considered harmful, and freedom of self-expression is thought to be essential for their well-being. Must not such freedom of self-expression be essential for the well-being of nations? And is such freedom possible in a state of dependence, however mitigated, softened or relaxed? For whatever may be said in defence of a political organisation, that comprises a controlling and ruling country at the centre and some dependencies hanging on it, there can be no denying that the interests of the ruling state, when they happen to clash with those of the satelites, must receive favoured treatment which may be open or covered, and that such treatment is bound to stifle the inspiration and initiative of the subject people, and thus to restrict and obstruct their self-expression. Moreover, the idea that they have not to defend and look after themselves, but are protected by others has a serious deteriorating effect on them. The process of self-help and self-organisation stimulates and develops qualities in men, which are essential for their full growth and for their survival in the struggle of the world. One need not point to a caged bird or a caged tiger to show how captivity and dependence deteriorate a being, both physically and mentally.

The stunted growth of people in all political dependencies is obvious enough. Not only the caged birds and animals die early, but politically dependent people also are found to progress towards gradual extinction. Look at the Red Indians of America, the aborginees of Australia, the natives of Africa, and the people of other occupied countries

In India also, though its old culture and traditions have still kept its country out of the gulf of extinction, poverty, death-rate, economic helplessness, mass-illiteracy, physical weakness and mental timidity, national unenterprise and disorganisation etc., have so increased during the few centuries of its political dependence that its future cannot be looked at with equanimity. Over and above, when one finds youngsters so ignorant of their own past that they open their eyes in doubt when told that they were once a great and self-defending nation with flourishing trade and prosperous economic condition, or when one reads of elders trembling at the thought of their country being left alone on its own legs, the stage of the country's all round degradation appears to be as much frightening as it becomes provocative of the thought that India has to be saved from it at any hazard, any cost, any sacrifice and any suffering. Imperialistic propaganda that sucks out manhood and infuses false notions of security and devitalising sense of ease and restfulness in sheltered existence, has to be counter-acted, so that people may regain confidence in themselves, in a better destiny for themselves, and in their ability to win a place for themselves with the free nations of the world on absolutely equal status without a 'but' and without any qualification. Such education, mental and physical, must be given to people from their childhood that when they bloom into maturity they may not be afraid to face the responsibilities, which are incidental to a life of liberty and freedom, and that may not be terror-stricken at the sight of a couutry like Poland falling in upholding its independence, but may rather take inspiration from the example of Poland to welcome all danger in preserving independence and to remain resolved to win it back now or hereafter at all cost and all suffering. It is such resolution that brings out super-qualities of courage and manliness and which has made small nations of yesterday powerful ones of today. What would have been Britain today if she had remained under the protection of the Romans? There would, have been no British Empire then; and 'Britannia rules the waves' would not have been said and heard. What would Germany have been if she had not exerted herself out of her weakness, disunion and disorganisation during the time of Napoleon only about a hundred years ago. In St. Helena, Napoleon once regretted that he had not annexed Germany instead of trying to take in Spain. Such was Germany in the last century. And how weak was Italy also at that time? And where was Belgium? A glance at the history of only a hundred years brings to light the above examples of weak country becoming great and powerful by self-effort, courage and love of freedom. There have been ups and downs in the life history of almost all countries and all nations, the ups coming when they were bold, adventurous and effortful, while the downs have followed the period of mere ease, effortlessness and individual saving-the-skin attitude. During the down phase those, who do not wake up but resign to their lot out of fear of struggle and suffering, sink deeper and deeper till they are suffocated; but those, who realise their condition, and taking courage and resolution in both hands, exert and rise, unswayed by danger and undaunted by initial difficulties and sufferings, pass out of the gloom and emerge again into the brightness of freedom and happiness of liberty. It is then that they receive the priase of history and the respect of fellow-human beings.

More than two thousand years ago, when the ruling prince of the Chu state in China, hearing of the great wisdom of Chuang Tsu, a great thinker of his time, sent his officers to him with noble gifts and an invitation to him to become the prime minister of he state, Chuang Tsu who was fishing in a lake when the officers arrived, told them without turning his head from the water surface:

"I have heard that in Chu there is a sacred tortoise which has been dead now some 3000 years, and that the prince keeps this tortoise carefully enclosed in a chest on the altar of his ancestral temple. Now, would that tortoise rather be dead and have its remains venerated, or be alive and wagging its tail in the mud?"

"It would rather be alive," replied the prince's officials, "and wagging its tail in the mud."

"Begone!" cried Chuang Tsu, "I too will wag my tail in the mud."

Wagging tail freely in the mud in preference to royal favour does not, however, it seems, appeal to educated Indians. Life inside a chest, that is looked after and protected by others, causes no worrying anxiety about external attack and gives a comfort-giving sense of security from the horrible plight of Poland and other foolish countries dying in self-defence! Who indeed should be called wiser, Chuang Tsu or those Indians who prefer a chest-life to an existence outside that is always open to danger?

THE NATIONAL GOAL AND CHRISTIAN INDIANS.

(By Cyril Modak.)

India's aspirations for freedom must be consummated. She must be free. Of late we have concentrated our attention on political freedom until many of us have come to believe in a very restricted meaning of freedom. It is necessary, therefore, to remind ourselves that India needs to be free from many yokes beside foreign rule. First of all, India must be free from fear. Millions of Indian men and women live in constant fear—fear of starvation, of unemployment, of displeasing those in authority, of disease, of social and economic insecurity of various kinds, and fear of malignant powers. When fear clutches the heart there can be no hope of normal growth of body, mind and spirit or of wholesome self-expression. Fear makes men and women moral cowards, compels them to be deceitful and hypocritical. Fear drives them to dreadful lengths of physical and mental suffering and often to a line of action which destroys all self-respect, courage, and dignity. The New India must provide against those factors that paralyse millions of our people with fear. The Indian State must make provision for the employment of every citizen in a field best suited to individual aptitudes. Freedom of speech and of considered self-expression, of registering legitimate protests, and of making valid demands must be assured to every citizen, regardless of creed, caste, or party labels. Definite measures will have to be adopted to free the people of the New India from the tyranny of fear.

We cannot hope to liberate people from the fear of malignant powers unless we aim at liberating them from superstition. There is nothing particularly pagan about superstition. Christians in the west have their own brand, just as we have ours. In fact, any belief seriously held which is not tested by reason is a superstition.

Priestcraft has contrived very adroitly to multiply and perpetuate superstitious notions, especially in India. Illiteracy and ignorance, chiefly due to lack of opportunity to learn, have afforded fertilized soil for our rich crop of superstitions. Illiteracy has kept thousands of men and women from acquainting themselves with facts and the propaganda of reformers. Ignorance has kept them credulous enough to believe without questioning what is handed down by tradition century after century. And they are willing to pin their faith to the most fantastic probabilities. The effect of all this is vicious. They are slaves to priest-craft and witchcraft. They often refuse progressive methods in agriculture and reject medical aid. They cannot appreciate the laws of hygiene and sanitation. They prefer to keep themselves shut away from beneficent forces. The New India must be rescued by the State from the ennervating darkness of superstition.

It has been possible for the caste-system with all its social inequalities to exist in this ceountry chiefly because vast numbers of our people have been doomed to ignorance and superstition. If those of the various disinherited castes had been equipped with knowledge, and the courage that comes with knowledge, the Indian social system would have been refashioned centuries ago. Social and economic and communal barriers dividing the nation into segregated camps have played more than enough havoc in India Not only do these irrational distinctions breed resentment but disunity and horrid complexes. People brought up to believe themselves inferior, unwanted, dispossessed by divine fiat, cannot contribute to national economy or play their rightful part in the life of that nation. No nation can expect to be strong and progressive which has tens of thousands of men and women who are outcastes, and, therefore, non-contributors. Legislation must be planned to rid the country of all caste or class or sectional compartments, so that the Indian nation can be a political unit, with all the advantages of socio-economic interdependence and cultural interpenetration. The new India must enjoy the democratic freedom of a classless society. "He that will be the greatest among you shall be the servant of all." (Matthew. XX. 27.) Are Christians sincerely trying to put this injunction into practice? Are we trained in Christliness enough to demonstrate the truth of these words? If the greatest of us is actually the servant of all, the distinctions of caste and class will not obtain in our midst, and we can co-operate with India towards the making of a classless society.

It is now as good as an axiom that only a classless society can liquidate poverty, by placing the national wealth at disposal of the community. We are now able, thanks to the self-sacrificing labours of intrepid pioneers to understand that the true causes of poverty lie not in the decrees of Providence but in capitalism and private property; and that the propertied class, vulgarly called the 'haves,' fights from all kinds of ambushes, under all manner of disguises, to protect privileges. And we know that the dispossessed class, vulgarly called the 'have-nots,' is allowed to go through informal tortures of abject poverty so as to be deserving of rich reward hereafter. We are convinced of the unspeakable injustice of the present system. We know several cases of wealthy 'untouchables' who received honours from everybody and in whose favour the 'touchables' were quite willing to relax caste restrictions. Scarcity keeps men, women and children under-nourished, sickly, dull, shut out from the satisfaction of common human needs. Indigence drives people to frantic immorality, to acts of desperation. Poverty must be gradually eradicated from the State of the New India. With planned economy every citizen of the nation should be free to enjoy the privileges of hard work, a square meal, opportunities for mental and moral improvement, and security for old age. India must find release from the despotism of poverty. If only the Christian ideal could be lived out we would probably reduce indigence by more than half. "But whoever possesses this world's goods, and notices his brother in need, and shuts his heart against him, how can love to God remain in him? Let us put our love not into words or into talk but into deeds and make it real" (I. John. III. 17-18). Are we willing to pay the price to put our "Christian" love not into words but into deeds and make it vital?

The people of India have had more than their share of unhappiness. The New India must be happy. It will not suffice if she has gained political independence and does not use that independence to implement the happiness and well-being of the people. But India will be happy when her millions are emancipated from blood-consuming insecurity, when the thought-life of her millions is released from ignorance and superstition, when her social system is reconstructed on a pattern of equity and justice, when her millions participate in planning the national economy, administration, and legislation. India will then be happy not because of some mysterious wand that freedom waves over the people. India's happiness must be the direct result of the fact that the needs of the vast population are satisfied. Their economic requirements, their social demands, their intellectual hunger, and their moral urge must find satisfaction when India is free. Then only will a free India be happy. As Jesus said, "I have come that ye may have life and I have it more abundantly."

Nevertheless the happiness of the New India must not become a stagnant pool and her freedom must not deteriorate into static reminiscence. The New India must be progressive. Her people must be constantly aware of the goal that has been set for the nation. They must be inspired to struggle together as one man, suffer with joy, keep on co-operatively toiling towards the national goal. It is because Indians were content to rest on their oars that India lost her liberty and her wealth. When the fruits of their labour are for them and their children for ever, there will be a strong incentive for hard work and patilnt endurance of hardships. The New India must be vigorous in experimentation, fearless in trying out innovations. She must not sink into the censervatism of capricious senility and persecute experimenters, discoverers, prophets, and pioneers in any field of thought or activity, provided of course, that such activity is not subversive to the highest interests of the nation as a whole. The New India must show signs of vital energy by sturdily forging ahead. She must witness to the integrity of freedom, the gospel of justice, and the reality of co-operating with God for the furtherance of His Plan.

Men and women will be needed, in tens of thousands, who can merge their identity, individual and communal, in the nation as a whole, and make it the ruling passion of their lives to serve God in the concrete service of the motherland. This cannot be done by a niggardly patriotism that always keeps one eye on returns. We must be willing to be swept away by nationalism to the high seas of defiant creativity and daring service. An alertness to seize opportunities of service should characterize our community. We should be prepared to collaborate with the Congress in any constructive scheme, in any task that has to be undertaken, in any piece of work calculated to further the cause of the nation. It may be the unromantic work of liquidating illiteracy in a given area; the arduous task of intercommunal reconciliation. It may be the drab routine of serving in a Congress Volunteer camp, or the exacting labours of rural or social reconstruction. Or it may be the untiring inculcation of national ideals into the minds of students or workers or peasants. Or it may be the privilege of taking part in a satyagraha campaign. If we have the vision of the New India constantly before us, we shall find work enough that needs to be done. We should not fall into the trap of waiting for spectacular undertakings. We should begin the work that calls for attention, begin with things nearest at hand, and strive to put the stamp of excellence on the smallest tasks.

Finally, we must be aflame with the passion for justice, brotherhood, and liberty, even as Jesus was. Then only will we be as sensitive as the Master and feel in our flesh the wounds of injustice, hatred, and exploitation inflicted on our people. Then only will it be impossible for us to fold our hands acquiesce, while freezing wrongs are heaped like blocks of ice on our emaciated men, women and children. Then only will we break all chains that keep us safe in callous isolation, and leap beside our disinherited fellow-citizens to share their misfortunes, their battle, their trials, and their triumph. Then only will we give the Master a chance of saying to us, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me." This is the plumbline which the Master will use to test our Christianity.

WHAT IS WRONG WITH WESTERNISATION?

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the editorial comment inserted by you at the end of the third paragraph of my criticism of Mrs. Saudamini Mehta's article on "Westernisation and Nationalism," you have done me an injustice. My objection has been not to the mere mention of the Gita or the Upanishads as such. I entertain profound reverence for these texts, my objection is to the wisdom of basing Indian Nationalism on them alone. What I have said, and what I do maintain, with due respect to you, sir, is that if we base our Nationalism on Hindu Religious Texts alone, we cannot quarrel with those who charge us with attempting to establish Hindu Domination. It is no question of displeasing Mr. Jinnah; and if need be I am prepared to displease him: but the whole of my argument has been that Indian Nationalism has to be Indian in character—neither Hindu exclusively, nor Muslim, nor any other variety.

Khar,
21 October 1939. } Yours etc.,
VEERBAL H. MEHTA.

[This letter refers to the second letter published under the heading "What is wrong with Westernisation?" in the last issue. Mr. Veerbal Mehta's signature was inadvertently left out. As regards Mr. Mehta's point much depends on one's conception of nationalism, whether as a convenient framework for the political economic interests of people resident in a country or as the fulfilment of the highest thoughts and aspirations which have inspired it in the past and inspire it in the present, imparting to it the momentum of historic continuity. In the latter and truer sense not only the Upanishads but also the Koran and the Bible have a place in Indian nationalism. This does not, of course, mean that on every occasion a passage from one of these scriptures should be balanced by others from other scriptures. A Hindu will naturally be more familiar with the Upanishads, the Christian (Mr. Cyril Modak's articles on Indian Christianity and Nationalism are examples) with the Bible, the Muslim with the Koran. But none of them can be banned.—Ed., I. S. R.]

THE VICEROY'S STATEMENT AND THE CONGRESS.

The Congress Working Committee resolution on the Viceroy's declaration on Britain's policy concerning India says:—

"The Working Committee is of the opinion that the Viceroy's statement in answer to the Congress invitation for a clear declaration of British war aims, particularly in their application to India, is wholly unsatisfactory and calculated to rouse resentment among all those who were anxious to gain and are intent upon gaining India's independence.

"This invitation was made not only on behalf of the people of India but also of the millions of people all over the world who were weary of war and violence and of the Fascist and Imperialistic systems, which exploited nations and peoples and were ultimately the causes of war and who yearned for a new order of peace and freedom.

"The Viceroy's statement is an unequivocal reiteration of the old Imperialist policy. The Committee regards the mention of the differences amongst the several parties as a screen to hide the true intentions of Great Britain. What the Committee had asked for was a declaration of the war aims as a test of Briton's bona fides regarding India, irrespective of the attitudes of opposing parties and groups.

"The Congress has always stood for the amplest guarantee of the rights of minorities. The freedom the Congress claimed was not for the Congress or any particular group or community but for the nation and all communities in India that go to build that nation. The only way to establish this freedom and to ascertain the will of the nation as a whole is through a democratic process which gives full opportunity to all.

"The Committee must therefore regard the Viceroy's statement as in every way unfortunate.

"In the circumstances it cannot possibly give any support to Great Britain, for it would amount to an endorsement of the Imperialist policy which the Congress has always sought to end. As a first step in this direction the Committee calls upon the Congress Ministries to tender their resignations.

"The Committee earnestly appeals to the nation to end all internal controversies in this hour of a grave crisis and to act unitedly in the cause of India's freedom. The Committee calls upon all Congress committees and Congressmen generally to be prepared for all developments and eventualities and to show restraint of word and deed, so that nothing may be said or done which is not in keeping with India's honour or the principles for which the Congress stands.

"The Committee warns Congressmen against any hasty action in the shape of civil disobedience, political strike and the like. The Committee will watch the situation and the activities of the British Government in India and will not hesitate to guide the country to take further steps whenever the necessity for this arises.

"The Committee desires to impress upon all Congressmen that a programme of resistance to be commensurate with the magnitude of the issue before the country, requires perfect discipline within the Congress ranks and the consolidation of the Congress organisation.

"The Working Committee realises that the non-violent resistance offered by the Congress in the past has been sometimes mixed with violence. The Committee desires to impress upon all Congressmen that any resistance that may have to be offered must be purged of all violence and to remind them of the pledges taken to this effect as early as 1921 during the Congress session at Ahmedabad and repeated on many subsequent occasion."

THE MUSLIM LEAGUE'S ATTITUDE.

The Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League discussed the Viceroy's statement on Britain's policy on India and passed the following reslution:—

"After careful examination of the statement of His Excellency the Viceroy dated October 17, 1939, the Working Committee of the All-India Muslim League appreciates that His Majesty's Government have emphatically repudiated the unfounded claim of the Congress that they alone represent all India, and note with satisfaction that His Majesty's Government recognise the fact that the All-Iudia Muslim League alone truly represent the Mussalmans of India and can speak on their behalf; also that the rights and interests of the minorities and other important interests concerned have been duly recognised.

"The Committee, however, feels constrained to state that the points of vital importance raised by the Muslim League in their statement dated September 18, 1939, are not precisely and categorically met. The Committee, therefore, ventures to suggest that, in order to secure co-operation on an equal footing, as desired by His Excellency, further clarification and discussion of those matters that are left in doubt and have not been met satisfactorily are necessary with a view to arriving at complete understanding, which alone would enable the Muslim League to co-operate in the matter which concerns not only the Mussalmans of India but the country at large.

"The Committee cannot wholly accept the narration of facts culminating in the enactment of the Government of India Act of 1935 as given in the statements of His Excellency, but does not think it necessary to enter into a controversy regarding those inaccuracies, historic and otherwise. The opposition of the Muslim League is not merely to the 'details' of the plans embodied in the Act of 1935 and reconsideration thereof, but their demand is that the entire problem of India's future constitution should be wholly examined and revised de novo. The Committee reiterates emphatically that no future plan of India's constitution will be acceptable to the Muslim League unless it meets with their full approval.

"The Committee also considered the proposal of His Excellency the Viceroy for the establishment of a 'consultative group,' but cannot at present express any opinion with regard to it until its status, constitution, powers, scope and function are fully known, but welcomes further consultation regarding this matter as proposed by His Excellency in his statement.

"In view of the urgency of the matter, the Committee hereby authorises the President to take such steps as he may consider proper to get the doubts removed and secure complete clarification of his Excellency's statement, and if the President is fully satisfied, the Committee empowers him to give an assurance of support and co-operation on behalf of the Mussalmans of India to the British Government for the purpose of the prosecution of the war."

The Working Committee also passed the following resolution :—

"The Working Committee hereby empowers the President to advise, guide and issue instructions to Muslim League parties in the various provincial legislatures in the event of some sudden emergency arising. The Muslim League parties shall give effect to or carry out such instructions as may be given by the President."

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANADLWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, t is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

India at the Dominions Conference:—A Conference of representative Ministers of the self-governing Dominions is shortly to take place in London to consider means of co-ordinating the efforts made in Great Britain and the Dominions in connection with the War. Asked by a Labour Member in the House of Commons if India would have a place in the Conference, Mr. Anthony Eden, who, as Dominions Secretary made the announcement, said that he could not answer that question. Later it was announced in a Press Note that India would have a seat at the Conference and that Sir Mahomed Zaffarullah Khan, Law Member of the Government of India and Leader of the Legislative Assembly, would occupy it. India is not to enter by the front door: she must sneak in by the back-door. Sir Mahomed is one of the brainiest of Indian public men. He is member of a sect which is considered heretical by his orthodox co-religionists, which is sure proof that he is a man with an individuality. Personally, therefore, his choice to represent India is about the best that could be made. But his position among the Dominion Ministers must be one of embarrassment. While they are at the Conference in their own right, the Indian will feel at every moment that he is there by sufferance. He is the mouthpiece not of his country but of the Indian Government which itself is the mouthpiece of the Secretary of State for India, himself the mouthpiece of the British Cabinet on Indian affairs. The position would have been slightly better if Sir Mahomed were not a member of the Government or if a non-official of equal ability could have been persuaded to act as the Indian delegate. Sir Mahomed's public utterances, of course, will be passed beforehand by the India Office. But, we trust, he will have opportunities in private conversations to inform British leaders of the real feeling of India outside the Princely order, that none of the war aims so far put forward has been such as to arouse enthusiasm in this country.

The Minorities Bludgeon:—Herr Hitler has made the maltreatment of German minorities in Czecho-Slovakia and Poland the main reason for his forcible acquisition of the two countries. M. Stalin has made the ill-treatment of White Russian and Ukranian minorities the justification for his absorption of more than one half of the Polish State. Mr. Jinnah has raised the cry of oppression of Muslim minorities by Congress Governments as his present slogan. As to the merits of this war-cry, the testimony of Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, no friend of the Congress, should be sufficient. Referring to the Hindu-Muslim problem, Dr. Ambedkar said that he did not believe in the allegations that the Muslims were being tyrannized or terrorized in the Congress provinces. All the Congress Governments published statements categorically refuting the allegations made against them by the Muslim League leader. Babu Rajendra Prasad badly let them down when, completely ignoring their statements, he wrote to Mr. Jinnah suggesting that the Chief Justice of India should be requested to investigate the charges. Mr. Jinnah in his characteristic style brushed aside Mr. Prasad's suggestion on the ground that he had placed the matter before the Viceroy who, in his opinion, is the proper authority to judge such matters. Mr. Jinnah prefers the question to be considered and decided as a political rather than as a matter of justice and equity. As usual the English Press has taken up the cry raised by Mr. Jinnah and are appealing to the so-called majority community to make up with the minorities. Thanks, however, to Herr Hitler and M. Stalin the minority stunt stands exposed in the eyes of the world and the slogan is in a fair way to disappear from the international vocabulary. Moreover, Mr. Jinnah, as we pointed out last week, is not only opposed to the politics of the Congress but also and even more to the renaissance and revival of Hinduism which the Congress did not start and can not stop. Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan has come forward with the suggestion that coalition Governments of Congress and Muslim League should be formed in all provinces as a measure of appeasement. Obviously only such members of the Congress can join in the coalition who are prepared to use the powers of the State to penalise the renaissance and revival of Hinduism. Under the circumstances and, if Mr. Jinnah should continue to be the guiding spirit of the Muslim League, a Coalition Government will be virtually under a mandate to suppress the entirely non-political movements associated with the revival of Hindu culture and religion. We have ourselves expressed a preference for an understanding between the League and the Congress but that was before Mr. Jinnah had pronounced his anathema against Hindu renaissance and revival. If Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan can take upon himself to keep Mr. Jinnah's fanatical hostility to Hinduism from overflowing into the policy and measures of the administration, his proposal may be worth considering, not otherwise.

Brahmin on the Brain:—A number of politicians representing at least four different parties have made a representation to the Viceroy. Their main grievance is that "owing to the system of franchise and literacy vote a community consisting of three per cent of the population (of Madras) which in an Assembly of 215 members, is entitled to 7 seats, has been able to secure seven times that number, viz., 49 seats, to the utter discomfiture of the non-Brahmins." We do not know what view Lord Linlithgow as Viceroy would take of this statement but to any open minded person the obvious inference from it would be that the distinction between Brahmins and non-Brahmins, is an obsession of the signatories, which is not shared by the bulk of the voters. This would be the most charitable view. The alternative, held by many in Madras, is that the signatories during the sixteen years when they were exclusively in power, so mismanaged the administration that the electorates refused to trust them again with the high responsibility. We prefer the first explanation. Some of the signatories have held high office under the Crown and are expected to advise the Viceroy with a sense of responsibility. Sir K. V. Reddi who has been Agent-General of the Government of India in South Africa, Member of the Governor's Executive Council and acting Governor of the province, is one of them. Sir T. Pannirselvam who has been a member of the Governor's Council, is another. Lord Linlithgow would perhaps be interested to know in what respect the Reddis' relation to the Tamil Catholics, Sir Pannirselvam's caste, is closer than that between the Reddis and the Brahmins or the Tamil Catholics and the Brahmins. Or take Sir Parasuram Patro. Do Sir Parasuram's people interdine habitually or intermarry with the Kumararaja of Chettinad's community? We are surprised to see the name of Mr. M. C. Raja in this galaxy. At the last reading of Mr. Rajagopalacharya's Temple Entry Act, he as leader of the scheduled castes was profuse, not to say fulsome, in his expressions of gratitude to the Brahmin Premier for forcing on orthodox Hindus this unpalatable measure which neither the Raja of Panagal nor the Maharaja of Bobbili, the two Chief Ministers of the Justice Party, ventured to introduce. Running with the hare and hunting with the hound, may be for the time being profitable but it is never edifying. In passing, we make a present of a fact which the signatories have missed. Six, perhaps all the seven Premiers of Congress provinces are Brahmins. So it is not only Madras but the larger part of the country which does not share the signatories' view of Brahmins as aliens. Neither Sir Mahomed Osman who was till recently the prominent leader of the Justice Party, nor the Maharaja of Bobbili, the late Prime Minister of the Party, has signed this disingenuous document.

Belated Criticism:—The great noise made about the Wardha scheme for several months has died away. No one speaks of it now. Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, ex-President of the Congress, in an address which he delivered last week thought it worth while to resuscitate the defunct animal to administer to it some well-judged but unnecessary flagellation. He defended the present system against the charges brought against it. He denied that it was responsible for unemployment and he rebutted the charge that it was too literary and bookish. The most important part of his address was his courageous advocacy of English as an essential requirement of Indian education. He was strongly in favour of having a national language, he said, but in a country which has big provinces and large language areas, no language had any chance of becoming a national language in the dynamic sense of the term. The learning of Hindi, he added, might be useful for limited purposes but it could not become the national language unless it was made the State language and had a common script. He called the compulsory teaching of Hindi in certain Madras schools a mere stunt and concluded that, in practical working, the present system of education would be very much better and that it would be in the interests of the country and the youth of the land if politicians left the field of education to be organised and reformed by the profession. But when the profession abnegates its high privilege and waits for orders from politicians the situation is indeed depressing, though it is inevitable when teachers are advised to bide their time and seek election to the Legislatures whenever they find a political party to take the financial responsibility off their backs wholly or in part.

Turkey and the Allies:—A notable event in Europe is the breaking off of negotiations between Turkey and Soviet Russia last week on the ground that the new terms suggested to the Turkish Foreign Minister at the Kremlin were not compatible with the earlier obligations contracted by Turkey with France and Britain. This is a significant return to international honesty after the confusion of the past year. A couple of days later Turkey concluded a pact with the Allies. The new Soviet terms were presented after virtual agreement had been reached with Turkey and it is a sign of the chaos prevailing in Europe that, while Her Hitler is believed generally to be a tool of M. Stalin, in this matter Herr von Ribbentrop is reported to have influenced the Soviet attitude. Turkey is the first check that Russia has received since her dramatic return in September to European politics. In a more cautious manner Finland is attempting to resist Soviet pressure. In this she has found effective support from her Scandinavian sister States and the United States of America has made diplomatic representations to the Soviet Government. President Roosevelt's appeals for peace and reasonableness, however, have less value today than they might have had before Herr Hitler's destruction of Poland when the United States policy in the event of its appeals and warnings being disregarded was not known.

Mysore :—Mysore has been long known as a progressive administration. The official Handbook and Guide of the Dasara Exhibition, presents it in the light of its many natural and artistic beauties. The tourist traffic is already becoming an important factor in the life of the State. The views of hills and rivers, the great Krishnarajasagar dam, the rapid electrification of the countryside, the educational institutions, and the harmonious development of culture and industry, are attractions and object-lessons to visitors of what Indian talent can do in a congenial atmosphere. The Prime Minister of Bombay, Mr. Kher, who recently paid a flying visit to Mysore, is quoted in one of the articles in the Guide to have exclaimed on visiting a model village, "I wish to have every village in India like this!" There was some murmuring in his political circle at this open-hearted praise of a State which has been represented as wanting in the essentials of constitutionalism. His Highness the Yuvaraja in a short paper commends the example of the United States to Mysore. Americans visiting India have often expressed admiration of the "poise" which they find in Indian life and a longing for some of it in the life of their own country. We have much to learn from the West but much too, as His Highness' recent thrilling experience must have shown, we have to be on guard against. India should evolve an industrial system in which man is master of his machine and not the machine the master of the man. The West, and the United States more than others, has deified the machine. Nazism and Fascism are but the process of mechanization applied to human life and the State. Even democracy is much mechanised through the ballot box. The Press has become a vast engine for the mass production of public opinion. But we can rely on the genius of India to keep everything within its proper bounds.

Baluchistan :—The total revenue of Baluchistan in 1937–38 was under Rs. 20 lakhs; the total expenditure amounted to over Rs. 84 lakhs, exclusive of Rs. 8 lakhs on Quetta reconstruction and other extraordinary expenditure due to the last earthquake. Last year the expenditure on the latter item amounted to Rs. 30 lakhs. Expenditure under these heads is expected to recur for some years more. Army expenditure on account of Baluchistan is not included. It must be heavy as the country has two common frontiers, Afghanistan and Iran. What benefit does this large sacrifice on the part of India confer on the people of Baluchistan? How does it benefit India? The Baluchis may be deriving some trade and other incidental advantages but their natural evolution as a people capable of managing their own affairs in their own interests, is certainly not fostered by this dependence on India. As for India itself, there are a hundred ways in which the nearly one crore spent on keeping Baluchistan dependent, may be utilised with greater advantage to the people. Parliamentary Government for Baluchistan would be a travesty. The best thing that can be done in the interests of the Baluchis, is to make Baluchistan a buffer State under a guarantee of neutrality jointly by India, Afghanistan and Iran. From the point of view of India, this would result in a large saving even if, during the transition stage, this country make a goodwill gift of, say, 20 lakhs a year to the new State.

Mr. Nicholson on the Germans :—Mr. Harold Nicholson who contributes a page to the Spectator every week, has had to beat a hasty retreat in the issue which has just arrived in India, September 15. He does it with little grace. It appears that a broadcast of his suggesting that Britain should show Christian charity towards the unfortunate Germans who were in Britain on the outbreak of the war, brought in a shower of correspondence, "the majority on the whole favourable." This unexpected support has had a peculiar effect on Mr. Nicholson who seems to have deserted the cause he had tentatively advocated in his broadcast. For he goes on to argue that the German suffers from lack of generosity, moral courage and loyalty. He has to "admit" that the German character is "contradictory and uncertain, and that it contains greater admixture of jealousy, vindictiveness and moral cowardice than is found in the Latin or the Anglo-Saxon temperament." He is, however, generous in not blaming the Germans for these unfortunate defects and he at once disclaims any special virtue for Englishmen or Frenchmen. He attributes the quality in the Englishmen to his security of wealth and power and in the Frenchman to confidence in the supremacy of his culture. He illustrates his remarks by a reference to the repudiation of Streseman after having been acclaimed as a hero by his people. Such a thing, he says, would not have happened in any other country. Mr. Nicholson has been brought up in the tradition that the British people are a species apart from the rest of humanity. Here he has improved on it. He regards the German as something sub human and only the fact that the British must be irreproachable makes him recommend charity towards the Germans found in their midst. Is there any difference after all between Mr. Nicholson's view and that of his correspondents towards the Germans?

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, October 21, 1939.

THE VICEROY'S STATEMENT.

The White Paper containing the Viceroy's statement embodying the reply of His Majesty's Government to the Congress Working Committee's Resolution on the question of India's participation in the War, was published on Wednesday. The substance of it was anticipated in The Reformer of September 23. We quote our observations:—

> We can readily anticipate the reply of the British Government. It will be to the effect that His Majesty's Government has given serious consideration to the matters urged in the Working Committee's resolution. They, indeed, have never for a moment been absent from their mind. But the Committee will, Government are sure, understand that at the present moment all things are to be subordinated to the supreme effort of winning the war in order to ensure the survival of democratic ideas and institutions. As soon as this urgent task is out of the way, the future constitutional position of India will have the first claim on Government's attention. A Conference of all parties, communities and interest will obviously be the best way of determining what its broad outlines should be. The Indian Princes also will be invited to advise. By this means, it is hoped, that a scheme satisfactory to all parties can be reached without unnecessary delay.

We claim no credit for our anticipation. British politics is dominated by a few ideas all of which are inspired by the motto: "Never do today what can be safely put off till tomorrow or the day after." The English vocabulary is rich in dilatory euphemisms, in keeping with this maxim. And as we said at the time, this is the only kind of answer which a man in the Viceroy's position can give. It is a great position with little initiative for conciliation, but plenty for repression. Lord Curzon attempted to enlarge its scope to make it commensurate with its imposing exterior; and came to grief. Later he himself emphasised the subordinate character of the Government of India in a controversy with Mr. Montagu which arose as an incident of the last war. The hand is that of Lord Linlithgow, but the voice is that of Sir Samuel Hoare. There is one thing for which, or rather for the absence of which, we are grateful in the White Paper. It is refreshingly free from the usual platitude that this war will make the world safer for democracy than the last one.

Although, therefore, we cannot profess to be disappointed, there are some incidental observations in the Viceroy's statement which invite comment. We are surprised at the Viceroy's statement that His Majesty's Government have not themselves yet defined with any ultimate precision their detailed objectives in the prosecution of the war. Only the other day, the First Lord of the Admiralty in a broadcast to the United States quoted and underlined the Prime Minister's declaration that the object of the present war was "to redeem Europe from a perpetual and recurring fear of German aggression and enable the peoples of Europe to preserve their independence and the liberties." There is no lack of definiteness about that. Lord Linlithgow can not ignore or repudiate it. India wants to know, and she has a right to know, what the effect of the redemption of Europe from the fear of German aggression would be on her own future. There are many in this country who think that the existence of some tension in Europe is favourable to the liberalisation of European relations with the Asiatic and African world. Apart from that, the present war will not end Europe's agony. President Roosevelt recently declared with perfect truth that economic nationalism is the root cause of the embitterment of relations between nations. The President's pronouncement from which the sentence is taken, has not been fully reported in this country. We trust Mr. Roosevelt probed the question further and got at the fact that economic nationalism is the necessary consequence of the economic conception of human happiness and that, so long as its citizens are dominated by this conception, the State must also be actuated by it magnified enormously. Whether the ethnic nationalism, which Herr Hitler seeks to substitute for economic nationalism, would prove an improvement can not be predicted with certainty.

The only force other than race which can compete with the economic motive in man is Religion. In India we have it in the form of communalism. For our own part we have regarded communal conflicts as preferable to class war, but this is not the prevailing opinion. If this war leaves economic nationalism intact, although the fear of Germany may go, the fear of Russia is bound to take its place. India will have to wait till that is settled to know what her future is to be. Lord Linlithgow is much too fair-minded a man not to see that this is straining even India's ancient and traditional patience a little too much. Even if His Majesty's Government are not in a position and do not care to declare in what way the War is expected to advance India's future there is one important point on which a pronouncement at this juncture would have been of the utmost value to non-European peoples. It is, the problem of race and colour. When their lives and liberties are endangered, the White nations do not hesitate to call upon the coloured people to their aid. General Franco overthrew the Republican Government of Spain with the help of his Moroccan soldiers. Algerian troops are fighting for France. Indian troops were engaged in several crucial situations in the last war. But in peace-time the coloured races are kept in political subordination. Although Japan as an Ally rendered important service in the last war her demand for the recognition of racial equality in the Covenant of the League of Nations was turned down at the instance of President Wilson and with the support of the British delegation. That question has since come to the front in a menacing form. A clear and unequivocal declaration that in the world conditions following the destruction of Hitlerism, the same principles of equity and international law will be observed between all nations irrespective of race, colour or creed, would have been a powerful force to rally Asia and Africa to the Allied cause.

His Excellency seemed to imply that the War aims can only be defined after the War and with the consent of the Allies. This reminds us of a countryman who went to the booking office at a railway station and asked for a ticket. The clerk enquired where to. The agriculturist retorted that it was no business of the clerk's and that when he got into the train it will be time for him to decide on his destination. Lord Linlithgow's position in this matter is quite original. No statesman in Great Britain has advanced it. Then, as regards consulting Allies, surely the people of India whose destinies are irretrievably bound up with that of Great Britain, are entitled at least as much as the Allies who are friends today and enemies tomorrow, to be consulted. The Viceroy foreshadowed the establishment of a consultative committee containing representatives of all parties. But without knowing what you are fighting for, the consultative committee can find very little to busy itself with. We do not also agree that Dominion Status can not be introduced during the war. On the other hand, if it is ever introduced it will be as a war measure. The admission of India to representation in the Imperial Conference was managed by Mr. Lloyd George as a war measure. But we do not believe Dominion Status is the solution of the problem of India's position in the Commonwealth. The alternatives are, as we indicated last week, Independence or closer co-operation. Independence, in the real sense, is out of the question. Camouflaged independence is no better than political subordination. It is worse because it virtually implies responsibility without real power.

Closer Co-operation—Union at this stage would be too strong a word—is the true way of making the position of India in the Commonwealth compatible with Indian self-respect. In matters concerning Foreign policy, Defence and Trade, Commerce and Industry, India should have the right and the machinery for continuous touch and consultation with the British Government. Something can be done to give immediate effect to this idea. Lord Zetland who as Secretary of State for India so assiduously hides his light under bushel, may be replaced by Sir Zaffrullah Khan. Dr. Ambedkar may be put in charge of an Indian Section of the British Board of Trade. Mr. Jinnah may be of great help to Lord Halifax as a colleague at the British Foreign Office. All three are members of minority communities and their selection would give indubitable proof of the earnestness of the British concern for the interests of minorities in this country. We do not agree with Lord Linlithgow that it is the business of the majority community, whichever it be, to persuade the minorities to give it their confidence. It is the duty of the Government for the time being so to administer the country as to harmonise and not to aggravate existing differences. Lord Linlithgow reiterated his faith in the Hoare scheme. He spoke of it as the result of the joint deliberations of Indian and British statesman. This is rather a Pickwickian agreement where every single suggestion of the Indians was rejected. Without questioning the good faith of British statesmen who took part in framing the scheme, it is patent that the effect of it has been and can only be to deepen every existing cleavage and create new ones. The test of good government in this country is whether it tends to reduce the effects of religious differences or whether it tends to increase them.

India is not the only country in which there are communal differences. The United States have a composite population of not only races and creeds but of nationalities which in their homelands in Europe are divided by traditional and bitter animosities. But the State as such recognises no differences and exerts a steady and constant pressure which moulds the whole into a single unit. So also in Soviet Russia. It was an evil hour when British rule in India departed from its original and long-sustained policy of favouring none by reason of race or creed. The process evidently is not to stop here. We protested against the use of the word "continent" as descriptive of this country in the King's message some weeks ago. The Viceroy has repeated that ominous word. Mr. Jinnah has grasped at the geographical misnomer but he has contented himself with calling India a sub and not a whole, continent.

Jews in Europe:—We published in The Reformer (September 16) an article on "The Jewish Problem" by Miss M. Gommes, a French student who had been visiting cultural institutions in India for some months. Her interesting impressions of Santiniketan appeared earlier in The Reformer. Miss Gommes who belongs herself to the community whose problems she discussed, dealt exclusively with the Jew in Europe. The attitude of other communities towards the Jews outside Europe, however, has been quite different. The present Arab-Jewish relations in Palestine are a peculiar development due entirely to circumstances beyond the control of both communities and they are by no means representative of the general Islamic attitude towards the Jews. In India there is nothing to distinguish a Bene-Israel from the rest of his countrymen. Nor is it possible for non-Europeans whose minds are free from the tyranny of literary phrases relating to Oriental splendour, Oriental ostentation, etc., to accept the theory that the Oriental's love of display marks the Jew out in Europe, from the others.

WHAT IS WRONG WITH WESTERNISATION?

I was very much surprised and pained to read an article on "Westernisation and Nationalism" from the pen of Mrs. Saudamini Mehta. Such articles purporting to be attacks, and very cheap attacks too, on the so-called process of Westernisation, proceed merely from reactionaries. It is curious that Mrs. Saudamini's sister, Mrs. Sarojini Mehta, is just now replying in the columns of one of your Gujerati contemporaries to similar attacks on Westernisation by a reactionary. So far as one can see, these attacks on Westernisation are generally to be found in this poor hapless country, or perhaps in countries like Afghanistan.

Countries like Japan and China which prize their independence, liberty, culture, to the same extent as we do, if not to a larger extent, do not mind at all the process of Westernisation going on in their midst; in fact they welcome it. The vast progress of Japan and progress such as is existing in China, all are due mostly to Westernisation. What is there to be afraid of in Westernisation? If a man puts on trousers, there is nothing for Mrs. Saudamini or people of her view to be apalled at in the vision of a denationalised India. There are thousands of Indians in European costume, who are more nationalist than people cased in the ubiquitous dhoti. There is a large section of women in Japan and China who have thrown off their kimonos and taken to European costumes. There is a large number of Indian Christian ladies in this country also who have been wearing European dress. Surely, Mrs. Saudamini will not say that all these women are not as nationalistic as women who wear their usual sarees.

Even women, however, have offended Mrs. Saudamini in some of their ways. Forsooth, they are using face creams, toilet powders, rouge and lip-sticks. And why should they not? When has this new Mrs. Grundy's spirit come over some of our women writers? If these new western toilet articles are appreciated by Western women, why should they not be by our Indian people and what is wrong and what is sinful in that? Not only this, but several of these toilet practices were found even in ancient India, and Mrs. Nilima Devi informs us in the Indian Home that long before the modern technique of beauty culture was ever thought of, women in ancient India, like the women in ancient Egypt, had cultivated the art of looking beautiful. She proceeds to say: "Rather it is the impact with Western civilisation that made us forget many of our ancient cosmetic recipes;" and it is a curious thing that we in India at any rate have neither fully accepted nor partially assimilated the Western mode of beauty culture. Mrs. Nilima Devi says the "annointing and massaging their bodies with scented oils were regular rituals. The juice of the betel leaves served the purpose of Indian woman's lip-stick: her feet and her toe nails were coloured with henna or lac, sandal paste, chua, musk, etc. She had got her own face powder. Annointing a bride with oil and turmeric at the time of the wedding is also but a part of the general beauty culture system." So, it is not that Indian women have taken all this from the West.

Mrs. Saudamini then makes a general and sweeping statement that "Indians have practically no artistic sense left in them now." One wonders what the late Mr. Kanaiyalal Vakil would have thought of this egregious sentiment! There has been even a marked revival going on for years now in Indian Art and we are having a quickened renaissance of Indian Art. We may not have still progressed to a large extent in this renaissance but that does not mean that Indians have practically [illegible] artistic sense left in them. The new schools [illegible] painting and the new schools of dancing, which [illegible] seen at present in the country, will convince [illegible] one that India is being thrilled at present with [illegible] national revival of Indian Art.

She sheds tears over the disappearance [illegible] "Chundadis" and "Patolas" of Pat[illegible] What is the use of shedding these tears? Eve[illegible] country has gone through the same process [illegible] relegating to the limbo of oblivion articles made [illegible] hand and favouring articles made in factories. W[illegible] are now reviving cottage industries, but only in [illegible] far as they will give the much-neeeded employme[illegible] in the agricultural districts. This is, however, n[illegible] the final stage. As soon as India gets industrialis[illegible] she will have no more room for all such industrie[illegible] Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru whom she quotes w[illegible] evident approval, is not in favour of keeping on the[illegible] cottage industries for ever and ever in the countr[illegible] Mrs. Saudamini attacks the westernised people [illegible] this country for having western furniture. I ha[illegible] still to learn that Mrs. Saudamini and people of h[illegible] way of thinking have gone to live in mud-hou[illegible] with only mattresses to sleep on. She attacks a[illegible] people who eat at table. I am sorry; but all th[illegible] attacks appear to me as crude, very cheap and ve[illegible] reactionary. All these ways and manners [illegible] life have nothing to do with real nationalism. [illegible] is just like the Pharisees who asked Christ whether h[illegible] would like his disciples to eat on Sunday or co[illegible] people on Sunday. They were so engulfed in the[illegible] conventions and traditions that they had neither th[illegible] generosity nor the farsightedness to look at wid[illegible] aspects of things. So these people are al[illegible] engulfed in their conventions and reactionary traditio[illegible] that they condemn people for following several of th[illegible] Western notions, whether in dress, or furniture, o[illegible] literature or Art. The most harmful portion of he[illegible] attack seems to me to be when she appears to c[illegible] down even the discipline in Western schools an[illegible] seems to imply that our children are better without t[illegible] Some of our foremost patriots and leaders hav[illegible] condemned the indiscipline which prevails among[illegible] our children and students. Surely we should no[illegible] condemn discipline, just becuse it happens to be on[illegible] of the best traits of the Western people. Militarism[illegible] does not come from discipline alone, but cowardic[illegible] comes from indiscipline, and it is no use saying that[illegible] we are governed by non-violence and truth and that, [illegible] "European civilisation seems to be based on violence[illegible] and greed." This self-unctuousness is nauseating[illegible] We are as bad or as good as other people, and w[illegible] cannot claim to be non-violent and truthful becaus[illegible] we can shout it the loudest from the house-tops[illegible] Our social life shows many a bitter example of th[illegible] breach of non-violence and truth. Only a few men ca[illegible] use these words in India. It is sheer blasphemy [illegible] when the rest of us use these words, regardless o[illegible] the deep abysses and chasms in our social life. There[illegible] are great lacunae in our political and religious [illegible] life and our past and present history where we have[illegible] not shone with a particularly greater grace than th[illegible] Western people, whom we are fond of abusing as [illegible] materialistic people. In The Reformer of October 7th Mrs. Saudamini Mehta, like another citizen of Calcutta, Mr. J. M. Ganguli, criticises what is termed "aping Western civilisation." Indian civilisation and Eastern philosophy have been extolled. Western civilisation, Western modes of thought and life are deprecated and we are advised to go back to olden days.

It is all very well to speak of India's past greatness. Every patriotic heart thrills with pride on the contemplation of past glories but what people who advise us to revert to the past, fail to realise is this, that there is a gulf of difference between the India of which they speak and the India of today. In doing so, they lay themselves open to the charge of purely Hindu revival, which can only mean Hindu Domination.

Mrs. Mehta says, "We have our principles of non-violence and truth to rely upon in the hour of peril, we had a glorious civilisation in the past and we can get plenty of inspiration from it, if we wish to." She goes on to quote a passage from Pandit Jawaharlal's autobiography wherein also the references are to the philosophy of Upanishads. When people who feel like this, speak of Eastern philosophy they make the same mistake and take it for granted that the philosophy of the East is the philosophy of the Upanishads, the Gita and the rest of our religious books. That the East is inhabited by Hindus as well as by Mohamedans, by Christians, by Chinise and Japanese, the Arabians and others is easily forgotten. Can an Indian nationalism be reared purely upon the foundation of Hindu philosophy and Hindu thought? If those who belong to this school of thought represented by Mr. J. M. Ganguli and Mrs. Saudamini Mehta envisage Indian nationalism founded on Hindu philosophy only, we cannot take exception to the charge Mr. Jinnah has been making against us Hindus that we are trying to establish Hindu domination in the name of Indian nationalism. [It is hard if people may not refer to the Upanishads and the Gita for fear of offending Mr. Jinnah.—Ed., I. S. R.]

The Indian nationalism that is worth living for and dying for is not the Hindu nationalism or its Muslim cousin or its Christian nephew. True Indian nationalism must be based upon a wise fusion of the thought and philosophy of all those classes of people, who constitute today the Indian population. The day may be distant, it certainly is very distant, but I dream of the day when we shall begin to understand the true significance of real Indian nationalism. This nationalism will teach us to remember only that we are Indians—children of the soil bred and broughtup by the same mother, Mother India—religions, castes, creeds, manners, customs, etc., which divide us so at the present moment need to disappear—at least to be subordinated to the promotion and growth of true nationalism. The Indian nation properly so-called is yet in the embryo and will be born only when the Indian Constitution and Indian laws will recognise Indians only as the children of the soil with equal rights and when those things that divide us and engross so much of our attention will recede into the background as private pursuits of individuals or classes of people with which politics, Constitution and the Law have no concern.

I do not believe that it would be necessary for us or for the Muslims and others to give up our religions; only we shall have to learn that in the privacy of the home or temple and the mosque each one of us will do what we like and wordhip as we may, but that there will be no public parade of our views or practices.

True Indian nationalism cannot be related with the wearing of Dhotar or the Sari or payjama and the Kudata or any particular attire appropriated by any class of people. At the proper time we shall have to evolve some sort of standardisation in our life which will bind us to gather by common ties of thought and practices in our public life.

"PARAPHERNALIA OF NATIONALISM."

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I hope my rather ruthless remarks about the stupidity of imitating the Westerner in matters of dress etc., does not by some mishap apply to the Editor. Anyway, I want to make it clear that it is not the dress in itself that makes all the difference, but the motive behind the dress. And the Editor gives away his case when he says "the European has always been lavish in his praise of the sari, often contemptuous of the dhoti." It is, then, according to his own putting of the case, with the rather cowardly motive of avoiding the European's "contempt," of appearing "respectable" in his estimation, of showing ourselves as different from the common people of the land that many Indians have adopted the outlandish costume of the West. Certainly such a motive cannot be commended. Is it not contemptible for an Indian to endeavour to reflect the European's irrational contempt for the dhoti, Indian music, or the simplicity of our way of living? Ah! the pathetic inferiority-complex that foreign rule develops in the ruled!

Besides, I cannot see why the tight pyjama and achkan, or the dhoti, tied in Maharashtrian style and kurta, or even the ordinary loose pyjama and kurta and "Jawahar" vest are not, for Indian conditions, more decent, serviceable, and convenient than European suits. Besides, they are more economical. Above all, they carry with them the dignity of moral victory. At least, those who feel proud to wear Indian dress, inspite of the liabilities imposed upon it, need never bow their heads in shame, for they have not capitulated to slavery in their hearts. This capitulation is the dangerous and disgraceful thing that we must constantly fight—and save our people from it.

It is not "one of the misfortunes of present-day politics that so much importance is attached to the style and material of one's clothes," but that so many otherwise intelligent people are obsessed with the dualistic error that they can cherish nationalistic ideals divorced from practice and in their conduct dance to the Westerner's tune. Externals, like foreign dress, mode of living, cultural taste, etc., are symptoms of depleted nationality. It is this disease which is harmful and has proved to be very contagious in India. The tragedy in such cases lies in the fact that those concerned try in various ways to avoid being identified with their own countrymen.

This has vicious psychological and moral effects. Surely, if the style of clothes is the only passport to circles of respectability, we might just as well challenge the respectability of those circles and not betray ourselves and our people. Logically, the paraphernalia of nationalism must be national. For nothing else fits.

Mere imitation is always cheap and unlovely and, therefore, inelegant. Whether social forms or cultural expressions, in personal tastes of art, music, literature, dress, food or anything else, mere imitation is most obnoxious. When such imitation itself becomes a fine art of self-deception meant to induce ourselves and others to take us for what we are not, it is assuredly to be deprecated. India offers a very wide range for the play of originality, whether in matters of dress or food or music or ornaments. Why should we sell our birthright for a mess of pottage?

To those who "express grave doubts of the capacity for the self-government of a people whose national dress is the dhoti," it may simply be said that if this is so, then, those who allow their women to wear clothes which merely punctuate nudity are throughly lacking in the capacity for self-determination. The fact is that the day more of our worthy compatriots renounce the diversion of mimicry and decide, like the Nehrus and Gandhiji, to don the simple national dress so as to identify themselves with their down-trodden, disinherited countrymen and countrywomen, that day the defeat of trousers will be established! Let me hasten to add, however, that just a change of dress and the paraphernalia will not automatically make one an Indian or a nationalist. It must be accompanied by a relevant change of attitudes and outlook, a change of heart. Or the change will only be to a national mummy from an a-national non-descript.

Indeed, I am proud of Indian women who have continued to remain more Indian than the majority of educated men. It is not only in the sphere of apparel, ornaments, and mode of living but in their national enthusiasm and their passion for independence. I deplore as much as Mrs. Mehta, the tendency that seems to be growing among certain sections of Indian women, towards the adoption of clumsy high-heels, and tawdry rouge and lip-stick. But is it not largely because many denationalized Indian men admire and pay court to these fashions that they are being adopted? If we are natural, genuine, and fearless and have a cultivated taste for what is really beautiful, beautiful in intention and execution, beautiful in thought and expression and effect, we shall all, men and women, decide to be just ourselves, not unprogressive, but not imitative either. And we shall strive to improve our own forms and infuse them with new meaning and create for ourselves and our people a country rebuilt in Beauty, founded in Freedom.

Lucknow,
October 13, 1939. } Yours etc.,
CYRIL MODAK.

[Mr. Modak does not seem to know exactly what he wants. When he says that the adoption of national dress would be useless unless there is also a change of heart, he gives away his whole case. If there is a change of heart, we should have thought it was immaterial under what dress it went about. It is the insistence on an outward sign that has led to a good deal of confusion and hypocrisy in the national movement today. When we suggested to clothes nationalists that it was possible to argue that Indian women were less and not more independent of Western influence, from the mere fact that they wore the sari, we did not expect that the argument would be so readily taken over by so fervent a patriot as Mr. Modak. Mr. Modak, after the insinuation that we share the prejudice of the European against the dhoti, blames the Indian man for the fact that some women in this country had taken to lipstick and rouge and high-heels. We had not expected this mawkish sentimentalism from a realist like Mr. Modak. Why, if he is right, did the Indian woman who resisted the invasion of Western fashions in dress, not resist equally the Western custom of paint? Mr. Modak's opening sentence reveals the same mentality as that which persuaded a Congress Selection Committee to reject a candidate for municipal elections because his socks were not Khadi! It is also shown by old women—of both sexes—who insist on feeling the clothes of their colleagues to see if they are Khadi wearers. Mr. Modak's political cliches are on the same plane. We would remind him that nationalism is itself a western conception and that in seeking to infuse national ideas in their countrymen rulers of non-western people have frequently begun by imposing western clothes. Kemal Ataturk equated nationalism wish westernisation even in dress. Mr. Modak has designated certain styles of dress which he is prepared to allow to Indians. Before his dress dictatorship is established, may we ask whether his exclusion of the non-Maharashtrian style of wearing the dhoti is due to lack of space or oversight or because he is "imitating" Western ideas of what constitutes decency in dress? Mr. Modak would set up a double control in dress: He would on climatic grounds insist on all Indians wearing the lighter clothes of the country; On grounds of decency he denies European women the lighter-than-sari dress that have evolved. Truly this is but a reversal of the English convention and as little rational as that. Mr. Modak's acceptance of Gandhiji's dress as national is a feat of imagination. As for Pandit Nehru, he has certainly set a fashion but that does not make it national.—Ed., I. S R.]

II.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue dated October 7, you have in a note entitled, "The Paraphernalia of Dress," bracketted Mr. Modak's admonition to his community and Mrs. Mehta's general reproof of middle-class families. Their only difference, you seem to imply, is in the audience they address. This, however, is all the difference. Mrs. Mehta is talking to and of a section of the community which can be westernised only in matters of dress, and there too only partially. Mr. Modak, on the other hand, is persuading a community which has been westernised in ideas, and in the most important and fundamental of them—religious ideas, not to become westernised in externals also. The first attitude is one which seeks conformity in ideas and conformity in externals; the other conformity in externals covering a revolution in thought. There is the more point to the revolution underlying Mr. Modak's dress nationalism since he is socialistic as well as Christian in his outlook. The difference between Mrs. Mehta and Mr. Modak is all the difference between the impossible and the insidious: Mrs. Mehta would stop all progress while Mr. Modak wishes to pour new wine into old bottles.

There are two other possible attitudes, that of Turkey under Ataturk and the other of Afghanistan under Amanullah: Ataturk's revolution was an all round one in externals and in thought; Amanullah's touched only the outside shell of Afghan life and the new clothes could not keep in the old thought.

GANDHIJI AND NON-VIOLENCE.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mahatma Gandhiji's word of encouragement or congratulation to Poland in the hour of her sore trial and his unconditionally throwing in his weight on the side of Britain and Allies that profess to fight for the sacred cause of democracies in Europe, have at once evoked severe criticisms of his life-long profession and advocacy of principles of Truth and Non-Violence. How can he ask Poland and her allies to resist force by force? How can he believe the skin-deep covering of Truth of the Allies' cause, when the real issue at stake is the natural fear of ultimate eviction by Germany and Italy of the Allies from their imperialistic domination of weaker peoples on earth? Do these inferior nations enjoy real or full democracy? What if the totalitarian states succeed?

The answer is that Gandhiji would be giving the premium to German force and aggression if Poland were advised to sit quiet or show the other cheek in a calm and non-violent manner. Germany lost her territories and colonies in the last War; and there was no doubt that, without another war or threat of war, there was no chance of her successful retaking of them. She could not hope to get them back with the help of the League of Nations or of a tribunal of Arbitrators without a sufficient or efficient sanction behind their award or verdict. She could not be indefinitely crippled by her interested foes. 'Sama,' 'dana' and 'bheda' and simple threat of force have easily brought round the several portions of old Germany erected by the Treaty of Versailles into independent and buffer states as against German resurrection. But Poland had defied them all, having tasted freedom and independence and desiring to maintain her integrity as a separate nation. The last means of 'danda' was adopted by Hitler to "bring Poland to her senses," in the face of Allies offer to help Poland in case she resists German aggression. The Czechs and others deemed prudence the better part of valour, and did not shed a drop of blood.

Gandhiji has no objection to adopting any means short of actual violence. But with the ancient sages of India he holds that if one person uses violence against another, that other is not only entitled or justified but even bound to offer or use violence to the extent, and only to the extent, of avoiding, resisting or neutralising such force. "Violence defeats violence or renders it nugatory." This applies to individual men and nations as well. It is a Samahita dharma or rule of life in contact with others. The Eikantika dharma may be different in that it may advise simple suffering without protesting or raising your little finger in return. That might lead to self-discipline and indirectly to reformation of the opponent. But this is of no use in the case of self-protection of individuals and nations. Governments have committed to their charge and protection the vast numbers of their subjects constituting the country's population. It would be but criminal to preach them non-violence which would mean complete effacement from off the face of the earth. But a self-defending attitude, though involving violence in return, both arrests and crushes the latter to some extent. Germany could not hope to get such a cheap victory hereafter. She may fear to strike, and is forced to look before she leaps. Best safety lies in such fear. Thus Gandhiji while advocating non-violence, does not mean to give the violence of the aggressor premium that it never deserves, but would only mean to say that any violence offered in arrest, mitigation, defeat, or destruction of violence started in the first instance or resort is no real violence of the same sort as the first but is of a different character altogether. Its purpose is different and the means limited to the barest necessity. Hence Gandhiji is perfectly consistent in his new orientation of his well-known principles. Herein lies the fact that he is not a mere saint or idealist but a true philosopher and statesman. And India must be proud of him, and of his lead.

Madras,
October 10, 1939. } Yours etc.,
R. V. V. TATACHARIAR.

[Mr. Tatachariar's original and ingenious explanation does not accord with Gandhiji's own commentary published in last week's Harijan and it must, therefore, be rejected. In two articles Gandhiji explains his position in detail. In the course of the first, "India's Attitude", he answers a correspondent who argues that there is little to differentiate the attitude of Britain and France from that of Germany, in these words:—

> There is this great difference: However incomplete or equivocal the declarations of the Allies are, the world has interpreted them to mean that they are fighting for saving democracy. Herr Hitler is fighting for the extension of the German boundaries, although he was told that he should allow his claims to be submitted to an impartial tribunal for examination. He contemptuously rejected the way of peace or persuasion and chose that of the sword. Hence my sympathy for the cause of the Allies. But my sympathy must not be interpreted to mean endorsement, in any shape or form of the doctrine of the sword for the defence even of proved right. Proved right should be capable of being vindicated by right means as against the rude, i. e., sanguinary, means. Man may and should shed his own blood for establishing what he considers to be his 'right'. He may not shed the blood of his opponent who disputes his 'right'. India, as represented by the Congress, has been fighting in order to prove her 'right' not by the sword but by the non-violent method. And she has carved out for herself a unique place and prestige in the world although she is yet far —let us hope, not very far—from the independence of her dream. Her novel method has evidently struck the imagination of the world. It has the right to expect India to play a decisive part in this war, which no people of the world have wanted by insisting that the peace this time is not to be a mockery designed to share a nong the victors the spoils of war and to humiliate the vanquished.

Gandhiji's own position in regard to the war itself as opposed to the peace that is to follow, is stated in another article, "On Trial", to be this, "I must declare my faith that it is better for India to discard violence altogether, even for defending her own borders." But the attitude of the Congress is not the same. When the Congress offers full cooperation, it means, as the Bihar Premier said in moving the resolution adopted in the Bihar Legislature, that "India is waiting only for a gesture from Britain and millions would rush to give their lives in the battlefield to help her in the present war." While both are agreed on the kind of peace to be worked out, there is a world of difference between the policies commended during the war itself. That is why Mr. Kishorilal Mashruwala, President of the Gandhi Seva Sangh, has in a press statement suggested that, in the absence of any clarification, the Congress resolution was a renunciation of satyagraha and likely to lead India to a tragedy. Mr. Tatachariar's explanation might be applied to the Congress attitude. It misses the mark hopelessly so far as Gandhiji is concerned. He in fact rejects that very policy as illogical and tragic. "Surely," he writes, "the means adopted for driving an enemy from one's house must, more or less, coincide with those adopted for keeping him out of the house. If anything, the latter process must be easier. The fact, however, is that our fight has not been one of non-violent resistance of the strong. It has been one of passive resistance of the weak." The reason for Mr. Tatachariar's error is to be found in the statement issued by Gandhiji on September 16 explaining the Congress Manifesto. He had there remarked that he was alone in adocating unconditional support to Britain and had appealed to all parties in the Congress to give the manifesto their unquestioned loyalty. These two sentences read together had misled Mr. Tatachariar and other readers to ignore a warning which had been slipped in between and which has in the passages quoted above been now expanded by Gandhiji. That warning was in these words: "Unconditional support could only be given on a non-violent basis. ..But the Committee could not take a purely non-violent attitude." Gandhiji probably glossed over the more important difference of opinion that had sprung up between him and the Congress Working Committee, in order to discourage dissensions in the party. Gandhiji often acts on the basis, though his readers are often apt to forget, that as a man out of the Congress, he is not subject to the restrictions aud discipline of that body. This too is a source of much misunderstanding. Ed., I. S. R.]

NOTES.

War Prospects :—According to the information available in this country through the Press and the radio, the War should not last longer than a few months. The New Year should see the War ended, Hitler and Hitlerism destroyed, Sovietism and Soviet Russia bestriding Central Europe, and perhaps the Western democracies preparing for another war to deal with it. Poland is gone out of the picture. Soviet Russia has absorbed the eastern and larger half of the country and Britain and France have not quite made up their minds whether they should regard this as an act falling within the terms of the guarantee given to Poland on the eve of the Nazi invasion. France meanwhile is taking drastic measures to put down Communism within her borders, which Russia can not regard as encouraging to her future relations with her late ally. The Soviet Government, once it has left behind its policy of territorial non-aggression, seems resolved to be content with no half-measures. By her Pacts with the Baltic States, Russia has practically eliminated other Powers including Germany from the Baltic. The Nazi Government has undertaken a plan of complete repatriation of all Germans from the Baltic countries in order apparently to avoid complications with her powerful ally. The war is now confined to the German-French Frontier. The British and French are together awaiting the big German offensive which, it is stated, will be led personally by Herr Hitler. The internal situation in Germany seems desparate and if the Allies inflict a defeat on the Germans on this front, a revolution followed by a civil war is almost certain in Germany. The attempt to establish a Communist Government after the last War was crushed but the chances of a similar attempt succeeding now are greater. Meanwhile the United States, since Russia entered Poland, appears to be veering towards a more determined neutrality than previous Presidential utterances led one to believe. Italy's attitude is ambiguous. The British Prime Minister made a statement on Thursday in reply to Herr Hitler's offer in his Danzig speech, but he had not a word to say on Britain's view of the Russian annexations in Poland and her subsequent negotiations with the Baltic States.

Italy and Germany :—Historians have stigmatised Italy's defection from the Triple Alliance with Germany and Austria. Stephen King-Hall in his "Our Own Times" observes :

> At the outbreak of the war Italy was a member of the Triple Alliance, the partner of Germany and Austria-Hungary. With her miles of defenceless seaboard, intervention on the side opposed to Great Britain was practically out of the question. Italy, however, continued to toy with the project of implementing her understanding with the Central Powers, until she could secure from the Allies sufficiently favourable terms to induce her to add her weight to the support of their cause. She secured these terms by the Secret Treaty of London.

Mr. Winston Churchill's reference in his broadcast speech to Italy's attitude at the beginning of the last War, was more complimentary. He made no mention of any bargain. "In those days of 1914 also," he said, "Italy was a neutral but we did not know the reason for her neutrality. It was only later on that we learned by the clause in the original treaty of the Triple Alliance that Italy had expressly reserved to herself the right to stand aside from any war which brought her into conflict with Britain." A reference to the correspondence which culminated in the Triple Alliance, does not bear out Mr. Churchill's interpretation. The secret clause merely said that the Treaty was not directed against Great Britain. "None of the contracting parties would think of declaring war on England, for none of them could conduct it with success ; but if England declared war there would be no choice." Thus was Bismarck's annotation summed up in the despatch of the German Foreign Office immediately before the Treaty was signed. The German and Austrian view of Italy's defection was more in accord with Mr. King-Hall's view of it than with Mr. Churchill's.

India and Britain :—We publish this week three articles on India's attitude to Britain and the present War in Europe. Mr. George S. Arundale, President of the Theosophical Society, hopes that both Britain and India will appreciate their responsibilities and rise to the occasion. He points out that India enjoys more freedom even today than do most other countries in the world; that, if we have grievances against the British Government, we are not entirely content with the rule of Congress ministries; but that at the same time Britain can in many ways improve the existing position. Mr. Modak takes the Congress attitude and calls on Britain to prove her bona fides, applying India as the crucial test to her professions of democracy. Mr. Ganguli sees in the attitude of the Congress a departure from its old declarations and an unseemly anxiety to confer with the Viceroy. The invitations extended to nearly every Indian politician in the past week lend point to Mr. Ganguli's comparison, made before these developments, to the Round Table Conference. The period of provincial autonomy has weakened the Congress position. During this period the party has been both divided and opposed. It is no longer possible to assert with the old assurance that the Congress represents every section in the country. Unfortunately the Congress has not acted in the past with the idea of functioning as the sole organization in the country. It has looked to others to accommodate themselves to its views instead of slowing down its policies with a view to taking everybody along with it. Only when opposition has grown troublesome, has it started negotiations which have failed or fizzled out. Obsessed by Hindu-Muslim unity, the Congress has failed to see the necessity of winning other friends when it found the Muslim League disinclined to co-operate. As a result it faces the Muslim League at each subsequent peace negotiation with less strength than it did before. In the discussions with the Governor-General at Delhi, Mr. Jinnah was empowered by Dr. Ambedkar and Sir Kurma Reddi to put their points of view before Lord Linlithgow. In the circumstances, Congress leaders could have refused to meet the Viceroy but they could not insist on his not inviting others to consultation with him. The differences that political parties have with the Congress are, it is true, mostly internal and the demands of the Congress manifesto have general support. But the internal differences have this bearing on the present negotiations at Viceroy's House: That the other parties do not want to see the credit for India's co-operation to go to the Congress and any consequent increase in its political power. This is the basic cause for Congressmen insisting on a postponement of differences till political power comes into Indian hands as well as for non-Congress anxiety for a settlement while a third party holds the balance. We hope that Lord Linlithgow will not adopt the obvious policy of making the differences an excuse for refusing a declaration. The differences, as we all know, are there. The problem is how to get over them.

The Next Step:—The Congress Working Committee has thrown the burden of decision on the British Government and there is some speculation as to what that Government will decide. The Liberal and Labour British press has so far shown itself sympathetic to the Congress demand for a declaration of war aims but it is significant that the heart of the London Times has not been moved. The Times declares that all that the Congress asks for has been done by the British Government since 1919 and that the progress so far attained without revolution—it has little knowledge obviously of what the Civil Disobedience movement was in effect and that even today the country has not recovered completely from it—would be endangered if anything was done to hasten the speed of reform. Political reform, so far as the Times sees it in relation to India, can be retarded safely but it cannot be hastened. Lord Zetland seems to hold very similar views and it is not unreasonable to regard the Times verdict as a reflection of official opinion. It is well, therefore, for the Congress to be prepared for a rejection of its demand for a declaration which may be more or less courteous. The manifesto clearly states that the Congress is anxious not to put difficulties in the way of France and Britain in their fight against Hitlerism even if it is not able to offer active co-operation to the British Government. The obvious inference is that, even if the Congress withdraws from its position of responsibility in eight provinces, it will allow those who feel that they can render help in the existing conditions to carry on, while Congressmen devote themselves to constructive work in the country.

The Return of Dr. Benes:—The calm and dignity with which he bore himself during the crisis of last September, won Dr. Benes the respect and admiration of the world. What must have hurt him more than the vituperations of Herr Hitler who was his declared foe, was the attacks launched him by countries with whom he was in ideological sympathy. A London journal was moved to write of him: "Have you noticed that Dr. Benes who is the idol of our sentimentalists, was allowed to resign the office of Presidentship without a single word of appreciation from his people? They felt he had led them down the wrong path...in an evil moment Dr. Benes allied himself to Soviet Russia." It was of Dr. Benes' Government that Mr. Chamberlain told Herr Hitler last September. "However much you distrust the Prague Government's intentions, you cannot doubt the power of the British and French Governments to see that the promises are carried out fairly and fully and forthwith;" — a statement which with its background of events seemed to accept or acquiesce in Herr Hitler's abuse of Dr. Benes. It speaks much for his magnanimity and patriotism that the Czech statesman should come forward with a proposal to raise a Czech army against Germany to fight with the Allies.

Destroying Hitlerism:—Among the war aims repeatedly declared by the British and French Governments, what has been hailed as the most important and the most tangible is that of "destroying Hitler" which has at last developed into destroying Hitlerism.

difficult to understand what is meant by this. The Times of India uses it as an excuse for Anglo-French reluctance to declare war on Russia. There is no such thing as Hitlerism, at any rate to our knowledge. By using this phrase in preference to Nazism, Mr. Chamberlain seems to have intended to make it clear that he has no quarrel with Nazism, much less Fascism. Will Hitlerism be destroyed if Herr Hitler gives up the leadership of the German people? Obviously it will be, only for the purposes of signing a peace, if the old system continues. The insistence on the destruction of Hitler can mean nothing more nor less than the detention of the German Leader in Anglo-French custody in order to incapacitate him politically. This seems to be a very inadequate ground for letting loose a world war.

Mysore and Mangalore :—The growing rapprochement between Mysore and Mangalore, which were parts of the same kingdom and shared a common Kanarese culture a century ago, evidenced by the visits, now almost a regular annual fixture, of the Mysore Dewan, Sir Mirza Ismail, strikes observers as having more than ordinary significance. But what? Sir Mirza Ismail in his speech in opening the bridge at Kateel, was himself moved to ask the question. But he did not see in it a desire—subconscious it may be—towards a closer union with South Canara. He gave it a very broad significance as emphasising the fact that we are citizens of the same country and united in her common allegiance. But that would apply equally to Malabar and the Ceded Districts, which the Dewan does not visit every year to open bridges and address students. However that may be, it is evident in all the speeches which Sir Mirza made during his visit that he found himself in congenial surroundings. There is a breadth and spontaniety in his remarks which is unusual in the speeches of administrators in their own jurisdiction. His appreciation of gardens at the Flower Show Exhibition at Mangalore, was lyrically reminiscent of his Persian ancestry :

The kiss of the sun for pardon,
And the song of the birds for mirth,
You are nearer God's heart in a garden,
Than anywhere else on earth.

This was surely written if not by a Persian by a highly persianised Indian.

Baluchistan Administration :—It is generally thought that all Baluchistan tribes are Muslims. This is not the case. In the short report on the affairs of the Kalat State included in the Administration Report of the Baluchistan Agency for 1937–38, we read, "Certain priests of Zikri tribes in Mekran spread false propaganda to the effect that their religionists were forcibly being converted to Islam. From the enquiries made it transpired that those who had embraced Islam had done so of their own accord. His Highness the Khan summoned the head of the Muslim Mission and the leading priests of the Zikris tribe to Kalat and a Farman was issued to the effect that no interference would be allowed with their religious sentiments." Incidentally it is noticeable that the Baluchistan administration has evolved an English of its own which is not easily intelligible to outsiders. Here is a specimen :

> The bye-river was running opposite Begari mouth this year up to September but all of a sudden a ghara which had already begun to form widened and the course of the river switched on from left to right bank opposite Begari mouth. The main river met the bye-river at its D/S end and its main current ran exactly along the right edge opposite the Begari mouth. The main river has again receded to the left side leaving a bye-river on the right side near the mouth of Begari, where a slow scour is occurring. It has left a very low katcha between the main and the bye-river.

The Report devotes many tables to detailed information about live-stock in the Agency. It is not easy to see what purpose statistics of castrated animals are intended to serve. The number of cows over 3 years old, according to Census, was one lakh and seven thousand. The number of approved bulls at stud was only 19 which fell far short of the number required to be maintained at one per hundred cows.

Long-Lived Frogs :—In an interesting article on Frog Folklore in the July number of the Quarterly Journal of the Mysore Mythic Society, Dr. S. T. Moses dismisses as incredible stories of toads occurring in stone, chalk, coal, etc., dislodged by the chance hit of a pickaxe, because, he says, they assume the capacity of toads to live for periods extending even to geological ages without air, food and water. Dr. Moses does not seem to have come across the account of the discoveries at Sopara, thirty-seven miles from Bombay, by Pandit Bhagvanlal Indraji in 1882. The site has within the last two years been further explored and found to have been the seat of the largest Buddhist stupa in Western India. Bhagvanlal Indraji records the finding of a live frog imbedded in clay twenty-one feet underground in the course of his excavations. "It is," he observed, "of a different species from ordinary frogs. It is about an inch and a half long and has a reddish stripe down the back. The sides are dark green, the chest white, and the arms and legs are dark speckled with white spots. A brick-coloured stripe passes over the eyes to the sides. The mouth was closed, and the seam of the closed part was of sulphur colour. The throat throbbed violently. I believe that it closely resembled a variety found in some of the old Kanheri cave cisterns." At the time of his writing, it was alive and kept in the Victoria and Albert Museum at Byculla. As the frog was found four feet below the stone coffer containing the relic box, which was itself seventeen feet underground, it must have been there for one thousand eight hundred years. Sopara was a great city in the days of the Mahabharata. The stupa was in existence before the third century A.D. Bhagavanlal Indraji's account of his discoveries at Sopara were published in the Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society for 1881–1882.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, October 14, 1939.

INDEPENDENCE OR CLOSER CO-OPERATION.

His Excellency the Viceroy has now nearly finished the series of interviews which he has felt it desirable to accord to representatives of organizations claiming to be mouthpieces of political parties, communal interests, and Indian States. To take the last first, Lord Linlithgow has had interviews with His Highness the Chancellor of the Chamber of Princes, the Jam Saheb of Nawanagar. Other rulers and chiefs have voluntarily placed themselves, their sons, their people and the resources of their States at the disposal of His Majesty through his representative in India for the effective prosecution of the War. The Congress after the ground had been prepared by two interviews with Mahatma Gandhi, its unofficial head, was given the opportunity of representing its standpoint through three of its official heads, Babu Rajendra Prasad, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. The Left-wing leader, Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose, was also invited by the Viceroy probably at the instance of Gandhiji himself. The President of the Muslim League, Mr. Jinnah, has, of course, been honoured with a prolonged interview, and remained in Delhi for further negotiations. Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, the Punjab Prime Minister, was at Delhi to mediate between the Congress and the Muslim League and had more than one interview with His Excellency. Dr. Savarkar, President of the Hindu Mahasabha, was invited to place the case of the Mahasabha before the Viceroy. Mr. Jamnadas Mehta and Mr. Aney, as leaders of the Democratic Swaraj Party, were also among those invited to give His Excellency the benefit of their views. Dr. Ambedkar and Mr. M. C. Rajah, leaders of the scheduled castes from two different standpoints, Sir T. Pannirselvam as leader of the Justice Party and the Indian Christian community of Madras, and some provincial Muslim League leaders, have also had the privilege of meeting His Excellency and placing before him their own particular aspects of the Indian problem in relation to the situation created by the War. The Liberal leaders, Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, Sir Cowasji Jehangir (also representing Parsi interests), Pandit P. N. Sapru, President of the Liberal Federation, have met the Viceroy as has also the non-party leader, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. The Khaksar leader, Allama Mushriqi, who is now in a United Provinces prison for breaking a Police order, has conveyed to His Excellency his readiness to place several thousands of trained men to preserve order in the country and if need be to fight the Empire's War on all fronts. once expressed our feeling that Dominion Status is unsuitable in the case of India. There remains, therefore, only two alternatives: Independence or closer co-operation. Independence in the light of the fate which has befallen Austria, Czechoslovakia and Poland within the last twelve months, can not be contemplated as a practicable alternative even by Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose. There remains, therefore, only the alternative of closer co-operation as the means of making the relations between Great Britain and this country such as the people of India can regard with pride. How this can be effected must be reserved for consideration.

The War and the Press :—"I was disgusted to see repeated the hackneyed war nonsense," writes Critic in the New Statesman, "about the 'poisoned chocolates,' while a correspondent in the Times pointed out the absurdity of talk about German bombers deliberately bombing individual Polish peasants. The Daily Mirror has a truly marvellous story about Germans dropping bright toy balloons full of mustard gas for the children." There would and should be no need to quote the passage in this country but for a tendency in some Indian newspapers to reprint the wildest and tallest stories from the British press. We are sorry to see that some of the organs of nationalist opinion are the worst offenders in this matter, while at the same time they staunchly support the Congress resolution to await a declaration of war aims before throwing in their strength in the fight to destroy Hitlerism. There might be something cheering for them in the rather childish rhymes with which soldiers are reported to be brightening up their camp lives but we do not see why Congress newspapers whose sheet-anchor was at one time proclaimed daily to be non-violence, should reprint some of the most bloodthirsty verses in their columns.

Rumours and Propaganda :—Some time back the press and the radio announced that the German Freedom Movement had reported the disappearance of Dr. Goebbels. This was hailed as almost a great victory though the value of Dr. Goebbels either militarily or morally for the Germans is always denied, until a later message said that he was believed to have been interviewed by foreign journalists in Berlin. This was again followed up by a cable that Dr. Goebbels was under custody and was to "disappear slowly." Dr. Goebbels so far from slowly disappearing has, according to the last message (Tuesday), addressed a party meeting on Winter Help when he asked his audience to prepare for fresh sacrifices. This particular report and its echoes seem to us pointless. Dr. Goebbels is not the key figure in the War with Germany and his presence or disappearance is not of any great value. When he does "disappear" as politicians must at some time, it will now require more than one message to convince the public.

THE QUEST OF PEACE.

A few days ago I passed another milestone in this life—the seventy-first. My friend, Mr. M. G. Joseph of Coonoor, had for some years been sending me a gift of flowers from his garden with his greetings on this event. This time it was a basket of great golden chrysanthemums "grown by my own hand," which kept fresh and diffused their gladness around for several days. Along with the flowers was a letter in which Mr. Joseph directed me to read Numbers, VI, 24, 25, 26. I had read many of the books of the Old Testament but Numbers I had somehow skipped. The psycho-analyst would have explained the omission as the outcome of a rooted sub-conscious repugnance to numbers. He will not be altogether wrong. All my life I have revolted against numbers. It seems as if it were today, though the incident is more than half a century old, that a maternal uncle bitterly reproached me for condemning the custom of enforced widowhood. "Who are you," he cried, "to set yourself against the whole body of our kith and kin?" He ended in high rage by pinching a bit of earth from the mud floor of the house and throwing it on my head. "My curses on you. May you be utterly ruined." If this had happened today I might have been somewhat perturbed. India is now wedded to majority rule. Mass meetings are the final authority in all matters. But in those days I was completely under the spell of the great rationalists. Merely to refuse to bend the knee to custom, is a service to society, J. S. Mill taught; even eccentrity is preferable to blind conformity as a force in the expansion of human freedom. Carlyle also had written that the majority are mostly fools. All great movements began with small numbers. As they waxed in numbers they waned in loyalty to their ideal. Democracy in those days was sharply distinguished from mob rule. It stood for certain definite principles, foremost among them being freedom of conscience. Acton interpreted History as the march of man towards greater and larger freedom. If majority rule had then prevailed, not a single one of the reforms for which the group to which I was drawn stood, would have survived. Some of the reformers themselves might have met the same fate. To escape it, several who began with great enthusiasm dropped out confessing pathetically that they were not equal to the domestic and social strain which conformity to their principles would entail.

This digression is by way of explaining my neglect of Numbers. On reading Mr. Joseph's advice I turned over the pages of my dilapidated copy of the Bible and lighted on these verses :

The Lord bless thee and keep thee :
The Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee :
The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee and give thee peace.

I was deeply moved. Mr. Joseph and I have not met for years and before that very infrequently. The Reformer has been the link between us. The speaker has his audience before him and knows how his words are received. The writer has not this great advantage. He has perforce to walk by faith, not by sight. "Cast your bread upon the waters and you will find it after many days." It is this thought which sustains and upholds the writer who feels that he has a message to convey, a mission to fulfil.

God give thee peace, says the Hebrew Prophet. Jesus Christ also regards Peace as a gift. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." The Gita and the bhakti schools of Hinduism hold the same doctrine. By His grace, says the Gita, thou shalt attain eternal peace. Obedience to the Divine will is the way to Peace, teaches Islam. In all these faiths Peace is a gift of God. Only, in Hinduism Peace is bound to follow renunciation in the spirit of faith. In Christianity it entirely rests with God whether Faith is rewarded or not by Peace. The wind bloweth where it listeth.

And there is also this to be noted: the gift of Peace is to the individual and, therefore, limited in time. The Seers of the Upanishads were not content with this. Their aims were universal and eternal. And they taught not how to obtain Peace as a gift but how to ensure it as of right. Theirs was the way of knowledge. The Seer of the Kathopanishad with conviction declares:

"Eternal Peace is to those spiritual heroes who see within themselves the One who is in all beings, Eternal among the ephemeral, the Inspirer of all consciousness, the One who dispenses desires in diverse form—Peace is to them and to none else."

Here we have the clue to Peace not only as an individual but pre-eminently as a world desideratum. Peace comes of viewing our particular problems against the background of the Universal. When a bereaved mother took her dead child to the Buddha in the hope that out of his compassion he may call her baby back to life, the Master did not accept or refuse her prayer. He suggested to her that she should bring him five grains of mustard seed begged of a family in which no one had died. The mother goes from house to house and everywhere she meets with sympathy. The grains of mustard are gladly produced. But when she asks if any one had died in the house, one and all lament that there have been several. And she comes back to the Master of Compassion, and tells him that she did not find a single house where no one had died. Then the Buddha delivers his message to her. Death is the lot of all living things. What is universal is not a matter for mourning. The argument would not go down with the European who is passionately wedded to his own particulars. Thus we have the angry protest in Tennyson's In Memoriam,

> That loss is common does not make
> Mine own less bitter rather more.

But being an Indian with a keener intuition for the universal than for the particular, the bereaved woman becomes Buddha's disciple and rises to be one of the greatest of them.

What is the root cause of our dissensions today? It is certainly that we attach supreme importance to our particular interests, as individuals, communities, nations, races and religions, and completely ignore the Universal which lies behind and unites each to all. When the nations are educated out of this error and not till then, will there be World Peace. Peace cannot be ensured by War. It can not be ensured by organization. It can be ensured only by educating men and women to see the Unity behind the particulars the wood before the trees.

This is the one and only lesson which it is India's mission to impress on humanity. If she herself loses faith in it or yields from opportunist motives to the temptation to compromise over it in order to strike a bargain which seems to bring some immediate profit, then there is nothing left for her but to reconcile herself to be the perpetual camp-follower of nations which have more faith in themselves and are prepared to make great sacrifices for it.

K. NATARAJAN.

INDIA AND BRITAIN TOGETHER.

(BY GEORGE S. ARUNDALE.)

As I survey the world as a whole, I feel ... happy that so far as India is concerned the ... of Hitlerism is practically absent. There may ... differences between the Government of India, ... the British Authority generally, and certain sections ... of the Indian people. Some of us may feel ... necessary to insist that this war shall be a ... for India's freedom no less than for other freedom ... in other parts of the world.

But while there may be this much of conflict, ... remains very true that India is governed in ... spirit of peace and of goodwill. There is a freedom ... in India, even despite the Defence Ordinances, ... like of which exists in very few other countries. ... There is an individual liberty of speech and ... action, and an impartiality of justice, entire ... without parallel as regards any country which ... subject to a measure of foreign rule. There is ... very wide liberty of the press, and the very ... Governments themselves may be attacked and ... their policies with a very wide impunity.

I remember very well after travelling through ... continent of Europe last year, feeling how delightfully ... free I was when I returned home to England. The ... atmosphere of no other country compared with ... free atmosphere of England. I felt that my ... individuality was honoured by a free State, and ... therefore I felt all the more eager to give reverence to ... the State because of the reverence it gave to me.

I felt the same when I returned home to India. I ... am in a free country again, even though it may be ... freedom which many of us believe should be ... exchanged for another and deeper kind. But I say ... very deliberately that India might go farther and fare ... worse, even if she went farther into Swaraj.

I am definite and emphatic that India must have ... her Swaraj, that she must govern herself, for there ... can be no true freedom which does not come from ... within. She must be herself, for only through being ... herself can she be real and true. And I no less ... emphatically believe that only India's self-rule can ... be the best for her and also for the world, even if her ... self-rule compare unfavourably in form—it never ... can in life—with other-rule.

But let us not be led away into undue denunciation ... of what is, through our eagerness for what we think ... should be. The Government of India is a very ... honest Government and I am quite certain that the ... members of the Indian Civil Service, while the ... British personal equation must necessarily have ... weight with them, are very honest in their eagerness ... to do their best; and so often their best is a really ... wonderful best.

There must be no enmity in India as she enters ... the last lap of her progress to the goal of freedom. ... It is very easy to point out the defects of British Rule. ... Is it after all so very difficult to point out the defects ... of the Congress Governments under the rule of ... which we are now? So far as regards the common ... people, among whom I class myself, there is not ... much to choose between one Government and ... another as there sometimes seems to be, though we ... well know that a really good Indian Government ... must be far more advantageous to the Indian people ... than a really good British Government.

But as Indians march together in India for the ... achievement of Swaraj, let them take care to observe ... the good that has been done in India by their British ... friends, and, if it may be, let the British and these ... selves march together to that which shall result in ... the greater common happiness of both.

I feel very sure that India and Britain must fight together in the war which is now upon us, and I am eager that, as the months of warfare pass, Hindus, Musalmans, Buddhists, Parsis, Jews, Jains, Sikhs, Christians and all other communities, shall come closer and closer together, so that that Universal Brotherhood which is the high objective of the war may at least be achieved within the smaller area of that which Dr. Bhagawan Das has called, as Dr. Annie Besant called it before him, the great Indo-British Commonwealth. Let us establish a wonderful Brotherhood of East and West to be the very heart of the greater Brotherhood which shall some day emerge.

From one point of view different sections may be fighting for different rights, but the war is to help us to perceive the One Right, and to adjust the different smaller rights to the Supreme Purpose of the Universal Right. Even where differences cause conflict, there must ever remain unbreakable friendship. Our foes must be our friends. Each one of us must be true to his own conscience, and there are many consciences. But enfolding them all is the One Conscience which the war will help us to discover and honour.

THE CONGRESS RESOLUTION ON WAR.

(By Cyril Modak.)

The Wardha Manifesto has hit the nail on the head with one graceful stroke. It combines chivalry with outspokenness and nationalism with internationalism. It is generous without being sentimental. And it assuredly voices the feelings uppermost in the hearts of conscious nationalists throughout India at this critical moment. But, perhaps, its finest feature is the courteous opportunity given to the British Government, which calls itself a democracy willing to make heroic sacrifices to defend democratic principles, to show the bona fides of democracy.

It is obvious there can be no dualism in democracy. There can be no valid distinction between the ideal of democratic rights and privileges, the ideal of a government of the people, by the people, for the people, and the practice of high-handed suppression of those same rights. No nation can convincingly call itself democratic which presumptuously believes the boon of self-government to be intended by heaven for itself and not for other nations. Such a distinction is based on a vicious dualism. The dualism is inevitable when the logic of democracy is used to make a case for imperialism. Bannerman was right when he said that "good government is no substitute for self-government."

A relative democracy, one which does not believe in itself enough to extend its privileges to all peoples, is self-negative. When a nation believes that it is the birthright of its people to be free and govern themselves for the best interests of all, by the representatives of the people, it logically believes that this principle is capable of being universally applied. The moment that nation makes exceptions with reference to the same birthright of other nations, it negates its democratic faith, inspite of its diplomatic protestation to the contrary. It gives the lie to democracy. It cannot sustain its claims. It is playing a game of hypocrisy which by its own inherent hollowness must run out in futility. India has given Great Britain an opportunity to examine her political and, therefore, moral standards, and choose once and for all between democracy and hypocrisy. We are watching with dubious minds what choice the Britain of Shelley and Burke, Mill and Wilberforce will make.

The unfaltering faith that Britain professes in freedom and democracy should enable her to see issues clearly, under the searchlight of dispassionate realism. It should be evident to her that a democratic form of Government superimposed by an autocratic regime cannot be defined as democratic. It should be clear as daylight that when this autocratic element is foreign, and retains the power to issue ordinances, in the teeth of popular disapproval, to curtail not only democratic rights but civil liberties, such a state of affairs is a lamentable contradiction of democracy. It should not be hard for her to understand that there can be no training in democratic self-government under foreign tutelage and dictatorial authority. We are waiting anxiously to see the British Government acquit itself honourably

It does not need statesmanship of any high calibre to see that if the British Government had sincerely intended democracy for India, the India Act would have been a very different document. There would have been definite plans for an increasingly strong national defence, military and naval, manned by Indians and officered by Indians. There would have been extensive plans for military and naval training for Indians at various centres of the country. There would have been greater confidence reposed in Indian ministers who would have been allowed to control the Revenue and Military departments. If Britain had truthfully intended democracy for India there would have been no need for the Viceroy's special powers in the event of war, which amount to dictatorship, and cancel the small measure of popular government that was otherwise in evidence. India would not have been declared a belligerent country unless the Indian National Congress, representing the largest section of the country, had so decided. Certainly, there would be no defiance of the will of the people, no opposition to and suppression of the legitimate rights of the people as is fast happening in India.

Appeals are being made to Indians to be loyal and support Britain in this war because she is fighting for liberty and democracy. Do those who make such appeals fancy they are addressing audiences of credulous schoolboys? Do the words "liberty" and "democracy" not ring false in their ears? What is the loyalty they wish to arouse in Indian hearts? Is it loyalty to the ideals of liberty and democracy? Or is it loyalty to a myth? And, obviously, it does not occur to these officials that those who are capable of being aroused to the latter are thoroughly incapable of appreciating Britain's so-called noble stand for the former, and thus have no need for such appeals! The Wardha Manifesto leaves no room for doubt that India is loyal to the ideals of liberty and democracy. It is up to the British Government now to show its bona fides and convince India that Britain too is equally loyal to the ideals of liberty and democracy: and how her loyalty to these great ideals will affect her connection with India. The gravity of the present crisis should suggest to Britain the course of honourable frankness and consistency.

The great issue that the imperialistic powers must face, at latest at the close of this war, is precisely that which the Wardha Manifesto raises in the case of Great Britain. Is democracy worth believing in?

If it is, can it be applicable to parts of the human race and denied to other sections? Or is it worthwhile enough to be universal? Perhaps if Europe, including Britain, had understood Christianity, which they have endeavoured to carry to other peoples, there would have been no need for war, because there would have been on the part of the various nations an attempt to establish liberty and brotherhood instead of markets and colonies in other parts of the world. Instead of the brutal race for markets and colonies, which must inevitably lead to conflict and more and more savage and destructive methods of war, there would have been the humanizing effort to lay the foundations of universal justice, liberty, and democracy. This alone can ensure peace. This alone can protect civilization and ensure progress. This alone can avert the calamity of the utter annihilation through war of the best of the race.

Force is not the last word in human relations. Blood-shed is not the great ultimate of the universe. Those who put their faith in guns and bombers and submarines, and all the latest inventions of the Devil's workshop, may yet be rudely awakened to the fact that these are weapons not of liberty and democracy but of exploitation and domination. The nations have yet to learn that the great principles of justice, truth, love, and non-violence are the ultimates, and that liberty can only be defended by the impregnable fortifications of justice, and democracy can only exist under a regime of non-violence. Differences settled by force are not settled at all but aggravated. Rights suppressed by force are not suppressed for ever but strengthened. Justice deferred by force is not deferred for all time but is given a greater momentum.

But Britain must remember that the bona fides of democracy are respect for the views of the large majority; effective measures for the maximum well-being and progress of the people, and for the protection of their liberty in accordance with the considered opinion of the people; and unequivocal action implementing such decisions as the country through its representatives might make. No amount of verbal jugglery will do. Nothing but the actuality will bear the strain of analysis. India has had time enough for careful observation, classification, and definition, and can distinguish between the intention of democracy and the intention of domination.

As far as we are concerned we believe, in the words of that devoted prophet of Liberty, Shelley:

"To suffer woes that Hope thinks infinite;
To forgive wrongs darker than death or night;
To defy Power which seems Omnipotent;
To love and bear; to hope till Hope creates
From its own wreck the thing it contemplates;
Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent;
This like thy glory, Titan, is to be Good, great, and joyous, beautiful and free;
This is alone Life, Joy, Empire, and Victory!"

And it is this freedom that we seek—this victory that we covet.

QUALIFYING NON-VIOLENCE.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

I agree with almost every word of what Mr. J. M. Ganguli says in your issue of September 30th about qualifying non-violence. The man, who, instead of thrusting a dagger into his opponent's heart pays somebody else to do it, or directly or indirectly encourages somebody to do it, deserves greater condemnation for being violent than the man who openly uses a violent weapon to remove his enemy.

Violence is violence, whether direct or indirect. There can be no non-violence which can aim at violent destruction by indirect means. I should think the time has come to cease talking of these high moral principles if at every step they have to be qualified in one way or another.

Yours etc.,

Khar,

INDIA AND WAR.

(By J. M. GANGULI, CALCUTTA.)

The visits of Congress leaders to the Viceregal Lodge, one after the other, bring to mind the story of the spider inviting the fly to walk into its parlour.

In view of their changing attitudes and their lack of confidence in their own avowals, one cannot be sure of what may be in the minds of those leaders or what their aims and objects in the negotiations are; but whatever they may be, one would be glad if they are not disappointed in the end. Should they, however, fail to gain their objective, they should realise the tactical mistakes that they have committed in the conduct of the negotiations, for without these mistakes they might possibly have succeeded better.

Being in power in most of the provinces, and having considerable influence over the people, the Congress was in an advantageous position to press their point of view on the Governmenthat sought its goodwill and co-operation. But the Congress house was divided, and indecision and nervousness prevailed there. When the hour of trial arrived, the leaders found themselves unable to reach the heights, which their declarations of the Congress ideals demanded. In an atmosphere of popular acclamation, surrounded by multitudes of hero-worshippers, without fear of opposition or retribution from outside, imaginations can soar high, and tongues can wax eloquent from a decorated rostrum within a Congress pandal, where surroundings are inspiring and the enthusiasm of delegates is stimulating. But in cold moments of action it needs superlative courage and an uncalculating spirit of sacrifice to translate to action what the imagination has pictured and what spoken words have formulated. Independence and purna swaraj are ideas, which come naturally topeople arriving at fulness of their growth and development, but to be advance guards in the realisation of those ideas, leaders are wanted who have the iron will to go the length of their utterances without a quail and without a hesitation. Is such strength of will noticeable in the Congress leaders?

That was tested recently when they sat in conference at Wardha to chalk their line of action during the war. Not long ago, the Working Committee had resolved to keep out of the war in pursuance of the Haripura resolutions of the Congress, and had advised the Congress ministries not to co-operate in war-work in the provinces and even to resign if co-operation was unavoidable. That resolution of the Working Committee had further committed the Congress Exeoutive to a non-co-operating attitude to war. But when time arrived to take action, the Wardha assembly looked at one another in indecision. They felt weak and helpless, and could only think of taking the counsel of others. Men whom they had ostracised, leaders of organisations which they had condemned as communal and reactionary, were all sent for to come and prop up the great national leaders, who found themselves facing realities, which were incidental to their ideologies and which called for action. In thus exposing their weakness and indecision Congress leaders made a great tactical blunder. To show weakness at the time of dealing with an opponent is to give a great psychological advantage to the other side. But the leaders were inexperienced in tactics. In every way, they demonstrated their timidity and weakness. After their previous resolutions, declarations and commitals, the occasion required only a few minutes' deliberation to resolve on the final steps to be taken on them and in accordance to them. Such prompt decision would have created a great impression in the other camp and also on people following the Congress lead. It would have proved the strength which they felt in them, the strength which an adversary always wants to estimate.

Instead of that, however, they prolonged their conference from day to day, showing clearly that they lacked the courage to be decisive. Their nervous behaviour reminded one of the indecision of the British ministers as to what to do when Napoleon, after Waterloo, arrived in the English waters in an English ship seeking English hospitality. When after prolonged sittings the ministers finally decided to despatch him to St. Helena, no British minister come forward to put his signature to this decision, out of fear of public condemnation on account of the atrocity of the St. Helena order. The Wardha leaders' fear and hesitation to come to a prompt decision had perhaps more than one reason, one of which apparently was, as explained subsequently by Pandit Nehru at an Allahabad meeting, their uncertainty as to their ability to implement their decisions. Pandit Nehru's confession weakened the Congress position still further in the eyes of the British Government. When a General of an army thus openly confesses weakness and shows nervousness in moving, what else should he expect but defeat and rout?

From another point of view also Pandit Nehru's statement is worth considering. If the Congress leaders had realised their inability to implement their words, declarations and repeated resolutions, should they have said those words and passed those resolution, and made the Congress the laughing-stock of the world? What did they have in their mind, when they framed those high sounding resolutions, if they did not feel in them the strength to go all out for their achievement?

Following its blunder in showing weakness and indecision at the time of acting, the Congress Executive blundered again. When the Government open negotiations and invited them to discussion, they should have objected to the Government's inviting leaders of antagonistic organisations like the Muslim League, also to the discussion. The Congress claims to represent the whole country and the whole nation comprising all communities; but the moment they allow without protest other organisations to participate in negotiations with the Government about a settlement between India and England, that moment they not only weaken that claim, but even forego it. When that claim goes, the claim of the Congress as the national organisation of the country to represent it in dealings with the Government is torpedoed. The British Government understands the tactics of weakening the position of the Congress by not admitting its claim to represent the country, and for that reason they make it a point to invite other groups and organisations antagonistic to the Congress whenever they meet its representatives. But the inexperienced Congress leaders do not understand the tactics of strengthening the Congress position by insisting on the Congress being dealt with alone in all discussions relating to the country's political status and future. Unless the Congress be prepared to stand firmly by its claims, it cannot expect to influence effectively the Government and drive home its advantage. An adversary is always interested in encouraging the formation of rival groups in an enemy's camp to put up rival claims against one another. But holding up one group against the other, he belittles the position of each and forces them all to modify their claims, till at last, after cancellation and neutralisation of many points raised by them, a compromised settlement is arrived at, which contains the elements of weakness and disintegration in an embryonic state that are sure in the course of time to all the more strengthen his hold and overlordship on them. That is simple enough and commonly practised tactics, which can be foiled by the leading party on the other side refusing to be drawn into group discussion in the enemy's camp and forcing him to recognise its claim to represent the other groups even when they are actually present. In spite of being in an advantageous position the Congress has miserably failed to play that game.

Commonsense and repeated experience of the past should also have warned the Congress against acquiescing in discussions with the Government when the latter were at the same time confering with other and rival groups also over the same issues. Gandhiji has reminded the Marquess of Zetland that the old bureaucratic language should be forgotten. But he and the Congress have failed to remind the Government that the old method of dealing must also be given up. Gandhiji has claimed for the Congress that it is the only national institution that represents all interests and all communities, and that it has nothing in its policy or programme that can be said to be detrimental to the interest of any group or community. Not that the Government do not realise that, but they cannot be expected to give force to the Congress position by admitting it, unless the Congress were to bring pressure to bear on them to do so. The Congress should have also pointed out that no good purpose could be served by sitting round a table with zealous and rival people pulling one another's legs and arguing in different directions, and that, therefore, it did not propose to waste time and divert energies by being a party to the farce of another round table conference. The idea of round table conference is as imperialistic as the idea of Federation in the form in which it was presented; and it can never solve the Indian question, though it can certainly make it worse.

The fact is, however, that the Congress leaders are lagging so much behind the ideals set up before them that they cannot command the strength and firmess required to maintain the gains already obtained and to utilise those gains for securing recognition of their position from a Government that is conscious of its strength and is disinclined to leave its entrenched position. Wanting in such strength and firmness they naturally, therefore, seek to follow the easier method of bargains, for which they always welcome any conference on any condition. Like an exhausted fly they buzz round a spider's web waiting for only an invitation to go into it.

The plight of Poland has evoked world-wide sympathy. But that is not because her case is the most heart-rending in the annals of human history. Attack on weaker countries by stronger ones has been common and frequent throughout ages, and each attack has been as lacking in moral justification as it has been the cause of misery and suffering. Even recent history is no more free from stain in this respect than the past. Think of Slovakia. Think of Abyssinia, a country in a different continent which Italy swallowed. Think of China, which has been encroached on territorially and economically by European and American powers, and has now been invaded by Japan. Going further back into history, year after year, the picture of attack, usurpation and exploitation of weaker native people in Africa, India, Australia, America, and practically all over the globe by militarily stronger European powers, comes more and more fully in view.

Judging, therefore, from the point of view of that philosophy, which has led strong powers, one after the other, to give touches to that picture, there is nothing strikingly pathetic in Poland's case. Rather it may be pointed out by those, who have been harder hit by the expansionist ardour of strong countries, that her case merits less sympathy than others. If her ancient history be not taken into account for consideration of the present issue, her present independent status is hardly of twenty years' standing, dating back as it was, only to the Treaty of Versailles. Then again her boundaries materially encroached on other peoples' territories. It might also be urged against her that she herself had not been without expansionist ideas at the expense of the weak, and that she had actually made territorial claims against Czechoslovakia, when that country was pressed by Germany last year.

With all that, however, Poland is now the object of sympathy for the world, that judges not on merit but is influenced by propaganda. If this world, that is now sympathising with Poland, had judged on merit, it would have melted into tears for Abyssinia. An innocent non-interfering country, with no expansionist ambition, encroaching on nobody's land, and bordering not on the attacking country's frontiers, was invaded by a country that unabashedly said that Abyssinia was wanted for its colonial expansion. The world kept silent. America did not send appeals to Italy; Democracies did not feel their ideals endangered, nor did they feel called upon to ally themselves in resisting the invaders: and the personal and pathetic appeals of the Abyssinian king from door to door of European and American Governments fell on unresponsive ears.

The invasion of Abyssinia seems even to have been forgotten. It is a thing of the past; its annexation is settled fact,—an enquirer is surely to be told to-day by even those world powers, who are appealing to nobler instincts in humanity for upholding the cause of Poland. But are not Poland's defeat and its occupation by Germany and Russia also complete and accomplished facts? Was not also the absence of Poland as an independent State on the political map of the world a historical fact at the time of the Treaty of Versailles? If that treat could upset a historical fact, and if Poland's allies avow that they would ignore and undo the present facts of Poland's defeat, surrender and occupation at the time of the concluding treaty of the present war, can not the facts referred to in the case of Abyssinia be undone and upset?

That is a question well worth answering by those, who say that they are fighting to-day not in self-preservation, but in defence of the principle of non-agression by the strong against the weak. If they want to prove their sincerity to the world they must definitely proclaim that the case of Abyssinia shall also be taken up with that of Poland at the end of the war, and that both countries shall be freed from foreign occupation. If I have proposed a definite proclamation about Abyssinia alone, it is not because I do not appreciate the feelings of a vast number of freedom-loving people in the world for Albania, native Africa, India, China and other occupied and forcibly colonised countries. I have referred to Abyssinia in particular because it is not only such a glaring and fresh example of most high-handed usurpation, but also of indifference to it of those, who are today making protestations of their adherence to higher human ideals.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANADLWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, t is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Mr. Churchill in the Cabinet:—An incident of personal interest consequent on the War is the admission of Mr. Winston Churchill to the Chamberlain Cabinet. The Prime Minister had for many months resisted intense pressure from influential men of his own party to take Mr. Churchill in his Cabinet. Mr. Churchill has been the ablest critic of the Prime Minister's foreign policy in the House of Commons. He is head and shoulders above any other Minister, has served in important offices of State, with distinction, was closely associated with Mr. Lloyd George as a colleague in the prosecution of the last War, has travelled widely and written brilliantly, and has influential social connections in England and in the United States,—some of which advantages are not possessed by Mr. Chamberlain. The one thing against him is that he has changed his political coat more than once. He left the Tories to join the Liberals and, when the Liberal fortunes showed signs of ebbing, returned to his old allegiance where he was not fully accepted. To those acquainted with Mr. Churchill's record in the last War, the Prime Minister's declaration in one of his statements that he will not be hustled into any operation against the advice of military experts, meant more than a precept of prudence. Mr. Churchill's broadcast last week which was relayed in more than a hundred centres in the States, has been enthusiastically acclaimed in that country. The entry of the United States into the war on the side of the Democracies, which would turn the scales against the Russo-German alliance. The tone of Mr. Churchill's broadcast was in marked contrast to Mr. Chamberlain's speeches on the War, which had always left some backdoor open for a negotiated peace. Mr. Churchill has shut and banged the door on the Fuhrer's face, while throughout showing studied deference to Russia and Italy. Russia, to his mind, has the same purpose as Britain, namely to put an end to Hitlerism, in invading and annexing half of Poland.

War Aims:—Mr. Winston Churchill quoted the Prime Minister's definition of War aims. The terms of it, he said, could not be bettered and could not too often be repeated. It is "to redeem Europe from a perpetual and recurring fear of German aggression and enable the peoples of Europe to preserve their independence and their liberties." Mark the repeated emphasis on Europe and Europaens as the objects whose interests are to be protected and advanced by this war. There has been some controversy regarding the request by the Congress Working Committee to be informed of the precise objects of the War. Here they are in black and white stated by the Prime Minister and echoed by the First Lord of the Admiralty. Mr. Winston Churchill declared a few sentences later: "We have the heart and moral convictions of India on our side." Mr. Churchill was, no doubt, thinking chiefly of the Princes in that declaration. The Princes have offered their support to the King Emperor purely for reasons of personal loyalty and not because they are anxious to save the independence and liberties of the peoples of Europe. Their heart and moral convictions incline more probably to the Nazis than to the democracies. Their chief preoccupation in recent years has been to stem the tide of democratic sentiment which threatens their existence. The removal of the Nazi menace from Europe and the safeguarding of the independence of European peoples, it must be clear to every fair-minded person, are not objects for which any responsible body of Indian leaders can urge their people to make sacrifices. They must have some reason which holds out hopes of a brighter world for their own people.

Kenya Indians and the War:—The Indian in Kenya has always protested strongly against the treatment meted out to him in East Africa and it should be more difficult for him to offer full and unreserved co-operation in the crisis that the Empire faces, than for any other member of the Empire unless it be the South African Indian. We were, therefore, surprised to read in the Kenya Daily Mail the report of Mr. J. B. Pandya's speech in the Kenya Legislative Council on behalf of the Indian community. Mr. Pandya said that the differences which Indians had with the Government and the European community "are merely domestic and such as are bound to exist in any large family." Neither the Kenya Indian nor the Kenya European has ever accepted this in the past and if Mr. Pandya's views are representative of those of the Indian community today, we should be very much surprised. If the differences are domestic, there seems to be no point in the continuous agitation let loose in this country to intervene on behalf of Indians in Kenya. There is nothing, and no one should know this better than Mr. Pandya himself, to justify the assumption that the troubles of Kenya Indians can be managed by their leaders themselves. Mr. Pandya who has often led deputations or paid private visits to this country to tell us how few rights Indians have in Kenya, showed an exaggerated sense of responsibility. "We have been talking and demanding rights in this country but we are also aware of the fact that rights have their corresponding duties and responsibilities," he remarked. It is just because Indians had little rights in Kenya that they, even the leaders among them, have very vague ideas of what their duties are. Even in the preparations for participating in the War, we do not know whether the Kenya administration is ready to enlist all its peoples equally without distinction. Mr. Pandya's arguments show that the Indian community is willing to render the fullest help to Kenya in the crisis that calls forth its best effort. Where he failed was in not referring in any way at all to the disabilities imposed on it by the administration, which prevent the community from making its full contribution.

War and Racialism :—The attitude that in emergencies differences must be repressed, has grave dangers, particularly with administrations like the Kenya one. It is an encouragement to the Government to rely on emergencies for a solution of their problems. Mr. Pandya had another reason to be circumspect in offering full support. If the end of the War should see Kenya with Uganda and Tanganyika raised to Dominionhood, we are sure the Kenya Indians would send another deputation to India to secure guarantees against the repressive acts of a White Government. There is nothing in Mr. Pandya's speech to show that he has any assurance that the sinking of "internal differences" will not be utilised by Europeans to advance their own narrow sectional interests in Kenya. Indian leaders have often been outmanouvred in Kenya and they need to cultivate a little caution. The differences which Mr. Pandya airily dismisses as domestic, are in fact nothing of the kind. The attitude of the Kenya European to the Indian is but a symptom of the disease which threatens Western civilisation. It exists in South Africa and the other Dominions, in the United States of America, in Britain, in Germany—in fact in all Europe except in Soviet Russia, the one country which lays no claim to "protect" Western civilisation today. The supreme question f non-Europeans is, Will the present War see t disappearance of that attitude or will perpetuate racialism in a more intense form It is a matter for deep disappointment that t present-day leaders of Europe are evading th issue. Mr. Chamberlain in saying that t will not permit Herr Hitler to domina over Europe and that he is fighting for th freedom of small nations in Europe, ha seized a perfect rallying-point for Europea He assures them that racialism shall not aga be permitted as between Europeans. He ha not the vision to rally Asia and Africa to h support by a similar assurance to them. An nobody in Europe feels the need as yet fo insisting on this issue. It is all the mo necessary that non-Europeans should steadi press forward the principle of race equality a every opportunity. Mr. Pandya has done a service to East African non-Europeans by h abandonment of this principle. After the la War, Japan tried to get it accepted but wa defeated by the manouvring of Presiden Wilson who feared the consequences in hi own country of the acceptance of race equalit by the League of Nations.

Viceregal Interviews :—The interviews whic the Viceroy has been having with Congress an Muslim League leaders, have alarmed the leade of other groups. Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, Sir Cowasji Jehangir, and Mr. V. N. Chandavarkar Liberals, Dr. V. D. Savarkar, Hindu Maha sabha, and Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, Independen Labour, have jointly sent a representation to th Viceroy reminding His Excellency that they to expect to be honoured in a similar manner. Lor Linlithgow, we have no doubt, is following th shrewd advice of Polonius to his son, "Gi everyone thine ear but few thy voice." If th Viceroy has not sent for Liberal, Hindu Maha sabha and Scheduled Caste leaders, it is easily explained by the fact that he is sure of their support under any circumstances, and wants n personal assurances of it from them. Th Congress and the Muslim League have adopte as their creed independence of the British co nection and the representative of that connectio naturally wants to ascertain what precisely the mean. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru who was the firs to be called, does not belong to any party but h is an ex-Member of the Government of India an a member of His Majesty's Privy Council and i thus entitled to be first consulted by the Viceroy It is rather a mark of confidence than a sign o neglect that Sir Chimanlal and the other signa tories have not been called to Simla and New Delhi. In view, however, of the claim of the Congress and the Muslim League that they alone can "deliver the goods," and also of the prestige of being consulted by the Viceroy it is to be hoped that His Excellency will give an opportunity to others also t display their wares at the Viceregal Court without, of course, any obligation on his part t purchase any from the exhibitors. Since the above was written, news comes that Mr. Savarkar has been invited to meet the Viceroy.

Mr. Jinnah's Jehad :—The expectation that his interview with His Exalted Highness the Nizam would have impressed on Mr. Jinnah the advisability of adopting a conciliatory and statesmanlike tone in dealing with national problems, has not been realised. The President of the Muslim League has made Lord Zetland's speech in the House of Lords on Indian affairs, the excuse for a tirade not only on the Congress but on Hinduism, which, apart from its irrelevancy, is derogatory to the speaker himself as a man of refinement and culture. Mr. Jinnah is at liberty to denounce the Congress for its aims and methods as a political organization. It has certainly laid itself open to the charge of not adhering in office to the principles it professed in opposition. That it is not the first party to do so, is no excuse, because it professes more than any other to be guided by hign moral principles. When Mr. Jinnah accuses the Congress, however, of "reviving throughout India the Hindu renaissance and domination and supremacy of Hinduism over the entire sub-continent," he is gratuitously indulging in language provocative to many who differ as much as, perhaps more than, Mr. Jinnah himself from the Congress. More than that, what he says is not the fact. The Hindu renaissance began a century ago and had very little to do with politics. It was the flowering of the genius of India repressed for centuries, in the warmth and glow of the freedom born of the study of English literature and history. This is even more true of the revival of Hinduism. Mr. Jinnah is paying an undeserved compliment to the Congress in attributing to it the "dominance" of the Hindu renaissance and Hinduism. Besides, "dominance" is utterly alien to the Hindu spirit. A religion and culture to which Spirit is the sole Reality, can not become 'dominant' even if some of its votaries wished to do so. In his last book, on Moses, the late Professor Freud remarks on the coincidence of monotheism with religious intolerance. The Turkish writer, Halide Edib Hanum, has also touched on the point in her account of the Turkish Renaissance. The cosmic outlook of Hindu philosophy and religion marks it out as a system which may permeate but can never dominate any other, as the monuments of Hindu culture in the Far East amply testify.

War and the Church :—A friend writes, "I listened on the radio to a service in a Church in Great Britain on the War. I have myself in days past conducted Divine Service and have preserved some ideas of what it should be. Humility, reverence and charity, I have always felt, are essential qualities in a sermon. These qualities were totally absent in the sermon which was preached in this Baptist Church Instead, the Preacher seemed to bully and browbeat God for having let loose on the world a monster like Hitler, and he passionately called upon his congregation to do everything in their power, to consider no sacrifice too great, to kill this demon which God (apparently in a fit of absent-mindedness) had inflicted on His children. The Service ended with a prayer to the same simple-minded God not to lead us into temptation, to deliver us from evil, and to give us this day our daily rations. The Priest had caught the war fever. 'When the salt hath lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted'."

The Paraphernalia of Nationalism :—We publish this week two articles, one by Mrs. Saudamini Mehta of Calcutta and the other by Mr. Cyril Modak of Lucknow, on practically the same theme, Nationalism and Westernism. Mrs. Mehta addresses all her countrymen; Mr. Modak reproaches the Indian Christian community alone. Both of them agree that matters are better today than they were "twenty years ago;" both congratulate the women for preserving their national dress when the men had forsaken theirs; and both look to Non-violence and Truth to save the country out of a present Westernist craze. Mrs. Mehta quotes the Upanishads and Gandhiji; Mr. Modak quotes Christ and Gandhiji. Mr. Modak will be glad to note that what he reports of a section of India which has been politically the least susceptible to Gandhian influence, is confirmed by Mrs. Mehta's account of middle class life. None of the two are quite fair to the objects of their censure when they pick upon the externals of dress, speech and food. Both Mr. Modak and Mrs. Mehta tell us, for example, that women have been more sensible than men in so far as they retained their national dress. They forget the conservatism of Indian men so far as their women are concerned. Then, again, the European has always been lavish in his praise of the sari; often contemptuous of the dhoti. This is seen in many mixed marriages in which the European woman takes to the sari while the Indian husband gives up the dhoti and adopts trousers. It was once cattily suggested that the chief reason for a marriage between an Englishwoman and an Indian was that the lady who liked the sari but was very much influenced by the opinion of her friends, wanted a justification for dressing in the Indian way. On the other hand, several European travellers and quite a number of residents in this country have expressed grave doubts of the capacity for self-government of a people whose national dress was the dhoti. It is possible to argue from this that even the retention of the women's national dress is a sign of "slave mentality"— both in relation to Indian male convervatism and to European opinion. It is one of the misfortunes of present-day politics that so much importance is attached to the style and material of one's clothes. Mrs. Mehta remarks and Mr. Modak suggests that the Good and the Pleasant are incompatible. There is no reason, however, why this should be so. A large amount of our troubles arises because we insist, in our thought and in the education we impart, on making the distinction.

WAR AND NON-VIOLENCE.

Pacifists who condemn war are not necessarily and actually believers in absolute non-violence. But it is difficult to see how one who believes in absolute non-violence, can be a supporter of war whatever may be its aim. Gandhiji's attitude to the present war between Germany and Great Britain and France, has shocked and surprised many in this country. It will no doubt be equally surprising to his friends abroad who as their contributions to Sir Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan's compilation presented to Gandhiji on Monday, his 71st birthday, show, have almost without exception understood him to be an opponent of violence in any shape or form and an uncompromising believer in soul force. Not only so, but on this specific issue between the Nazis and the Democracies he had expressed himself in quite a different way. John Hoyland's contribution to the birthday book is a thorough-going plea for renouncing violence absolutely and without qualification. Hoyland quotes Gandhiji as telling him in the course of an interview :

> Ultimately, he (Gandhiji) declared, force, however justifiably used, will lead us into the same morass as the force of Hitler and Mussolini. There will be just a difference of degree. Those who believe in non-violence must use it at the critical moment. We must not despair of touching the heart even of the gangster, even though for the moment we may seem to be striking our heads against a blind wall.

Hoyland quotes again :

> Non-violent resistance is the best method under all circumstances. I do not think that Hitler and Mussolini are after all so very indifferent to the appeal of world-opinion. But today these dictators feel satisfaction in defying world-opinion because none of the so-called Great Powers come to them with clean hands, and they have a rankling sense of injustice done to their people by the Great Powers in the past. Only the other day an esteemed English friend owned to me that Nazi Germany was England's sin, and that it was the Treaty of Versailles that made Hitler.

The seemingly glaring discrepancy between Gandhiji's recent statements and those quoted by Hoyland, is to be explained by the fact that we, Indians, are almost unconsciously led to talk in absolute terms when we speak to Christian missionaries. In actual behaviour, in the presence of our problems, we are apt to be more accommodating than Western intellectuals who have arrived by logical processes to a conviction of the futility of violence. Bertrand Russell is an outstanding instance. He is a scientist and a philosopher. He has no tolerance for mysticism of any kind. He has studied the potentialities of modern weapons and their effects on modern war. His conclusion is that there is no way of avoiding the disasters of modern war except a resolute, persistent, unflinching propaganda against all war, in the full knowledge that results can come but very slowly. He concludes his closely reasoned little book, "Which Way to Peace?" with the following declaration printed in bold type :

> If I am right in this — and the reasons which I have set forth, on the basis of official and ex- pronouncements, are overwhelmimg—the duty of ev- friend of mankind, of everyman who cares for a aspect of civilised life, of every patriot, and of ev- parent who desires the survival of his children, simple and clear. (The following is in bold type): abstain from fighting, and from all voluntary par- cipation in war between civilised states, to use ev- effort to persuade others to do likewise; to bring possible influence to bear to prevent the participa- of his country in war; and, within the limits of capacity, to aim at similar results in other countr- also.

A declaration by the Congress or even singly Gandhiji if he could not have persuaded Congress, that as a believer in non-violence as religious creed, he can not agree to the partic- pation of his country in any war, would hav immensely strengthened the cause of pacifis- all the world over. The rights of conscientio- objectors are recognised in Great Britain. Lo- Samuel's opinion expressed in a recent spee- that conscientious objectors should not b- exempted, evoked sharp criticism in the Britis- Press. It is true that India as a whole is n- and never was committed to absolute no- violence in the Gandhian sense. The Bhagava- Gita is a philosophical plea for war in a defen- of dharma which might be interpreted to mea- Democracy by those who practice Democrac- The participation of India in this or any othe- war, therefore, can not be objected to on ground- of religious principle. It is quite within th- rights of an Indian political leader to accor- support to the war if democratic principles ar- extended to the Government of his country This is exactly what Gandhiji means. Hi- dharma as the virtual leader of the Congress i- not the same as his dharma as a moralist. Th- paradox is inherent in our dual nature as being- endowed with physical bodies and non-materia- souls. The Gita advocates war for dharma and- also proclaims ahimsa as the supreme dharma- Strict rules were laid down for limiting the violence of war to soldiers of the warrior tribes- bearing arms and in the ranks of battle. The- position of the Gita clearly was that killing- enemy troops in open war was no violation o- the dharma of ahimsa. That is probably- Gandhiji's position which has been carried t- impracticable extremes by his western pacifis- admirers.

Duke of Windsor :—The return of the Duke- of Windsor to England after three years since- his abdication, is one of the incidents of the War- situation which has an intensely human interest. The Duke soon after arrival in England as the- guest of a personal friend, called on his brother, the King. It is announced that the Duke who- is a Field-Marshal has temporarily relinquished- the dignity and as a Major-General will join the- Army in relatively a subordinate capacity. His- photograph widely published, on the doorsteps of- the War Office where he had gone in his new- capacity, shows that the Duke has entered- on his new role unhampered by any thought- of the supreme Headship of the State which- he had voluntarily relinquished.

PRINCIPLES OF NON-VIOLENCE.

(By Prof. P. A. Wadia, Bombay).

We celebrate today (October 2) the jayanti of one whom we in India regard as the exponent of the longings and aspirations of the people who dwelt in the valley of the Ganges in ages past, longings and aspirations which an ease-loving generation like ours might be in danger of forgetting under the glamour of a commercialised civilisation leaning on the support of bombs and machine guns. We are today in the midst of a war in which we are participants, as an appendage of the British Empire. When in 1914 the nations were called upon to sacrifice their millions, in the name of liberty, democracy and self-determination, who could have dreamt that at the end of the sacrificial blood offerings, we were sowing fresh seeds of blood, and would have to prepare for another and a more terrible haulocaust of precious human lives? We are now faced with this war. What shall be our attitude? In answering this question shall we not turn to the life and teachings of one whom we look upon not merely as a leader, but as the very embodiment of all that is best and highest in India's culture and civilisation? What is the essence of Gandhiji's life and teachings? Is it not to be found in his doctrine of truth and non-violence?

Let us dwell for a moment upon the implications of "non-violence." There are two possible interpretations of non-violence—and both seem to be present in Gandhiji's writings and pronouncements. He frequently speaks of his method as the method of "soul force." Referring to the non-violent movement in South Africa he said: "Passive resistance is a misnomer..." The idea is more completely expressed by the term "soul force." Active resistance is better expressed by the term "body force." That this "soul force" of which he speaks is not ahimsa or Love, may appear paradoxical—and yet it must irresistibly force itself upon those who desire to penetrate to the truth behind the misconceptions created by human prejudices and by the will to believe. Non-violence involves very often a type of coercion more effective than violence—and Gandhiji uses it as a weapon for the redress of social injustice. "In my humble opinion," he declares, "the ordinary methods of agitation by way of petitions, deputations and the like is no longer a remedy for moving to repentance a government so hopelessly indifferent to the welfare of its charge as the Government of India has proved to be,"—an observation which would be equally applicable to any government past or present which exploits the power that it possesses for the promotion of its possessor's interests. And yet the confusion between non-violent resistance and love or ahimsa is not difficult to understand when one remembers that Gandhiji was endeavouring to harmonise the insight of a great religious teacher with the necessities of political leadership. The practical advantage of non-violence as a political weapon lies in the fact that it affords protection against resentment which violence is apt to create in both the parties to a conflict.

But this note of expediency which marks the use of non-violence as an instrument of strategy for an oppressed group must be distinguished from that religious idealism that underlies the doctrine of ahimsa which can make no claim to social efficacy—for if love is an absolute value, it can desire no return for itself—and it is most potent where it is purest. Gandhiji has dreamt—and who will not dream with him?—that the only hope for the redemption of of society lies in the universalism of love. It is the hope which once animated the early Christian community, a hope that has been born again and again, and refuses to accept the spirit of defeatism which guaranteed equality in the eyes of God and yet accepted whithout questioning slavery, injustice and war as parts of a world order which God had devised on earth for the weakness of human beings and perhaps as a check on sinners.

Let us forget for the moment the disillusionments that humanity encountered at the end of the last war—and ask ourselves the question what are we going to do to-day, when we are in the midst of another war which threatens from day to day to grow into a world war? When the Indian National Congress asks for a declaration of British policy with reference to India, they might as well have raised a larger question. Can the individualistic societies and nation states of our times, absorbed as they are in a group selfishness, renounce their policy of acquisitiveness and the diplomacy of power and profits? For so alone can the dissolution of the world in which we are living to-day be prevented. Will the allied countries, with which our own destinies are linked, work at the end of the war not for a peace dictated by considerations of war guilt and revenge, forced on unwilling statesmen by the passions of an electorate used to the sight of blood and fed on censored news and war propaganda, but for a better world order that demands sacrifice on the part of the victorious countries? At this crucial moment shall there not be searchings of the heart on the part of those who are capable of thinking? If there is an imperialism that flourishes on the economic utilisation of the resources of dependencies, there is another and more subtle type of imperialism that looks upon self-governing colonies as preserves to which access is to be denied in practice if not in naked theory, to those outside the preserves. You cannot have co-operation inside your nation or empire and competition outside. And so at the end of the war history might repeat itself: in the hour of victory in the ardent desire to "protect" peace they may overlook the promotion of justice and the reparation of wrongs—and the blood sacrifice of millions may have been offered in vain.

We have been told that political movements are determined by forces of nature rather than by pure idealism; that the desire to substitute absolute justice and forgiveness for vengeance can result only in an ascetic withdrawal from the world and in the disavowal of political responsibility and yet there can be nothing more tragic for the world than such a spirit of defeatism. Gandhiji's teachings and life are an ever renewed plea for the sacramental character of all life —whether individual or group life. If the values of civilised life are to be saved, we must refuse to believe in the inevitable selfishness of group life. Forgiveness may not always induce repentance in the wrongdoer; but yet it may. Loving your enemy may not always soften the enemy's heart: but are there not possibilities that such a result may be achieved? Love and unselfishness may not always shame an opponent into a relation of reciprocity: but they do have that effect at times. And if the nations of the world are to be saved from the chaos and destruction that now threaten, we need to have new illusions, a new madness of the soul, a new all absorbing enthusiasm which can enable us to break through the brutal aspects of man's collective behaviour, so that justice may be realised on an international scale by the pouring out of a love that seeks no return.

WESTERNISATION AND NATIONALISM.

(By Saudamini Mehta, Calcutta.)

Western civilisation has been dominating the world for the last two hundred years. Western ideas, Western manners and Western modes of living are spreading throughout the world. And no wonder. With the help of scientific inventions, the Western countries have become powerful and have conquered many countries of the Eastern hemisphere. Whosoever is in power is admired and also imitated. In India the British have been in power for nearly two centuries and so naturally the conquered nation had admiration for its conquerors. It is not surprising that the Indian intelligentsia in the nineteenth century should have succumbed to British ideology. What is surprising is that some people should continue to suffer that delusion even in the twentieth century.

Now let us see in how many things and ways we imitate our rulers. In education, in manners and modes of living, in dress and costumes, in artistic tastes, in industrialism and even in our outlook of life we imitate the west. The aim of modern education in India, according to most people, is to acquire proficiency in the English language. A school where English is taught well, even at the cost of all other subjects, gets the reputation of being a first-class school. We have a false notion that these Anglo-Indian schools have a very good sense of discipline and that our children should learn it. Bertrand Russell says in his book "On Education": "The fundamental idea is simple; that the right discipline consists, not in external compulsion, but in habits of mind which lead spontaneously to desirable rather than undesirable activities." What these English schools teach is only external compulsion which has been found to be extremely harmful as is evident from the example of Germany. No country excels Germany in external discipline. It leads to militarism of the worst kind. We do not want that in India. Then why should we desire that our children should imitate the Western nations in outer discipline?

Another weakness among our people living in big cities is to learn to speak English well. If our children learn to speak correct English at an early age, then we are flattered and we feel that they are well-educated. The craze for imitating the English people makes us forget that there are far better aims of education than learning to speak English with a perfect accent.

Unfortunately we cannot even imitate well the methods of education prevailing in Western countries. Though their methods are far from perfect, they are much better than those in India. We should realise that every country should have its own peculiar and suitable method of education and that no country can progress by blind imitation of other countries.

In the mad passion for copying the West we have lost all sense of imagination. It has become a fashion to arrange one's house with hideous furniture on Western models. We forget that these heavy chairs with big cushions are peculiarly suitable for cold climates. But we do not pause for a moment to think of the utility of things that we use; we at once jump to the conclusion that this kind of furniture must be good because the English people use it. More Anglicized people eat on the table and look down upon those who are not civilised enough to introduce this Western mode of eating. Those who are supposed to be more advanced do not stop here. They imitate the Western people in the habit of smoking and drinking. To them, those who do not smoke and drink, are not sufficiently smart to move about in fashionable society. But we know at what cost our young men have adopted these Western habits! How many examples we have before us promising and capable young men who have ru their lives by falling into these vicious We habits! Luckily, by Mahatma Gandhi's influ the Congress governments are having Prohibi in their Provinces and the drinking habit become very soon a vice of the past in parts of the country.

The habit of imitation has deprived us originality. Even in the matter of dress, we g up our own national dress which peculiarly s the climate of our country and adopted the West costumes which are meant for cold countries which are also extremely expensive. As a re of our slave mentality, twenty years ago, an Ind dressed in European costume was respected m than a man dressed in Indian dress. Fortuna we are beginning to realise that thick coats and collars and socks look ridiculous in hot countri Even English people are giving up these unnecessa clothings in this country. Our Indian clothes wh are easily washable are admirably suited for country. Our women, being wiser than men, not give up their saree—which is one of the beautiful and artistic dresses in the world—in pref ence to European dress. But even women could resist the temptation of imitating their West sisters in some ways. Lately face-creams and to powders, rouge and lipsticks have entered ma Indian homes. And high-heeled shoes have beco common among bourgeois ladies. None has benefi by these things and they have only increased t expense of living.

Indians who were once renowned for sculptur painting and all kinds of fine arts have practical no artistic sense left in them now. Our artisans h such fine sense of colour and designs in old da and they used to make beautiful "chundadis" Rajputana and lovely "Patolas" in Patan. B foolishly we gave them up in order to imitate t Western taste. Instead of buying beautiful han woven Indian cloth, we began to buy dull, inartist cloth that came from Manchester. Later, we ga up all good swadeshi things to replace them cheap and hideous Japanese goods. Little did realise in imitating the foreign aesthetic tastes th we were killing our own indigenous industries. A we gave up buying pretty hand-made things of ou own country, our artisans became poor and ultimately gave up their profession altogether. Thus, Indi which was one of the richest countries two hundre years ago, became the poorest country of the world.

When the rich men of our country saw th capitalists in Western countries were maki enormous profits from factories and workshops, th began to introduce industrialism in this country. do not want to enter into a controversy as to whet industrialism has benefited this country or not. B one thing is certain that our capitalists imitate on Western capitalists in making huge profits but th do not imitate them in looking after the welfare an comforts of the workers. John Gunther writes in hi "Inside Asia": "To India belongs the doubtfu honour of having the worst slums in the world. The bustees (hovels) of the jute workers near Calcutta are worse than anything in Poland, worse than Naples o Glasgow or even Shanghai. Workmen getting three or four rupees a week live in cells with no light, n water, no sanitation, the entrance of the hovels is a tunnel streaming with sewage. Nine to ten people may live in rooms eight feet by six. Disease squalor, degradation of the human being to the level of animals are rampant as men live in stinking filth."

Thus we see that we imitated the Western people in things that suit us. But may we not now stop and think for a moment whether it is desirable to go on imitating the West any farther? So far we have not gained much in our imitation of the West. I do not mean to say that we have learnt nothing good from western civilisation. But unfortunately we have mostly imitated the undesirable things from the lives of the Western people and did not care for the desirable aspects. Even after being in contact for 175 years with British people, we have not learnt punctuality, regular habits of life, the necessity of taking physical exercise, sense of duty and responsibility. Neither have we imitated them well in patriotism and in the habit of working co-operatively, in the service of the community for the common good.

Before going further in our pursuit of Western ideals we must find out on what Western civilisation is based and where it is leading to. European civilisation seems to be based on violence and greed. Westerners thought that they had created a magnificent civilisation and yet today we see it crumbling down before our own eyes. Their innumerable vast factories, their wonderful scientific inventions, their capitalism, their imperialism and even their communism have not been able to establish peace in Europe. And what is Europe today? It has become a huge slaughter-house. Is it then desirable to follow in the foot-steps of the European peoples? Is there nothing on which we can rely to save our country from disastrous violence? We have our principles of Non-Violence and Truth to rely upon in this hour of peril. We had a glorious civilisation in the past and we can get plenty of inspiration from it if we wish to. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has a beautiful passage in his "Autobiography" about India—old and new. The passage is long but I cannot resist the temptation of quoting a few lines from it. He says, "And yet India with all her poverty and degradation had enough of nobility and greatness about her." And further, "Despite the woeful accumulations of superstition and degrading custom that had clung to her and borne her down, she had never wholly forgotten the inspiration that some of the wisest of her children, at the dawn of history, had given her in the Upanishads. Their keen minds ever restless and ever striving and exploring, had not set refuge in blind dogma or grown complacent in the routine observance of dead forms of ritual and creed. They had demanded not a personal relief from suffering in the present or a place in a paradise to come, but light and understanding: 'Lead me from the unreal to the real, lead me from darkness to light, lead me from death to immortality' (Brihadaranyak Upanished). In the most famous of the prayers recited daily even today by millions, the gayatri mantra, the call is for knowledge, for enlightenment." This passage reminds us that we can have no better guidance than that of the Upanishads to revive our ancient civilisation. We need no more imitate the West blindly. We may take the good points from the Western civilisation and blend them well with the good points of our own ancient civilisation and thus create a new ideal for young India to follow.

There is one fundamental difference between the philosophy of the East and the present practice of the West. In Kathopanishad we have a beautiful shloka which says.

"One thing is the Good, and quite another is the Pleasant. These two to different ends bind a man.

Of these two, for him who taketh hold of the Good, it is well: He fails of his aim who chooseth the Pleasant."

The modern ideal of the West is to choose the Pleasant and leave off the Good. Thus they miss the aim of life and ultimately create a chaos out of which it is difficult to come out. The modern outlook of life in India is based on this principle of choosing the Pleasant instead of the Good. But we should take care to remove this ideal before we go too far. A man or a nation which chooses to take up the Pleasant path instead of the Good path may prosper for a time but its prosperity can never be ever-lasting. The history of the world has ample examples as to prove this theory. Mighty Empires rose and fell because of this principle.

Let us hope that the younger generation of India will create a new civilisation based on the ancient ideals of Upanishads and in harmony with the present conditions. Then we shall no more need to imitate the West.

NATIONALISM AND CHRISTIAN INDIANS.

(By Cyril Modak, Lucknow.)

Nationality is a constant feeling of belonging to a particular nation. It is nourished by common historic traditions, deepened by achievements and suffering mutually shared, kept alive by the stimulus of a common national goal. Prof. Harold Laski says, "It is obvious that there is something exclusive about nationality, that the members of any given nation have a sense of separateness from other people which gives them a feeling of difference, of uniqueness, which makes domination by others so unpleasant as to involve profound discomfort to a point which may involve, even justly involve, resistance to that domination." (Liberty in the Modern State. P. 194.) While nationality is a constant feeling which becomes the foundation of effective citizenship, nationalism is an expression of outraged nationality or bellicose nationality. Outraged nationality finds expression in what we may call freedom-seeking nationalism, while bellicose nationality manifests itself in empire-hunting nationalism.

The West is familiar with empire-hunting nationalism inevitably leading to War and all its horrors and destruction. Westerners coming to India, especially as missionaries, confused the empire-hunting brand of European nationalism with the freedom-seeking type of Indian nationalism; and the confusion led them in all earnestness to teach their converts that nationalism was out of focus with Christianity. We will not let ourselves be detained here by a consideration of this and other ways in which many foreign missionaries have proved to be pawns in the iron hand of imperialism. But this choice morsel from the pen of a missionary must be quoted, "There are far more missionaries who attend parties in Government House and other such functions than there are those who have close contacts with nationally minded Indians, especially if they are Congressmen." (Leonard M. Schiff. "The Present Condition of India." p. 158.)

Christianity as it was presented to us, upto twenty years ago, helped to deplete our nationality and make us hanker after the most stupid relations and kinship with the 'Whites' generally, and the rulers in particular. Freedom-seeking nationalism inspires countless men and women to struggle against entrenched wrongs, to defy power that has all the ruthless weapons of war and to demand liberty in the face of full-panoplied imperialism. This nationalism is the expression of full-blooded nationality when that nationality is violated. Quite clearly, then, a parlour nationalism is evidence of depleted nationality.

And that is the grave problem we face in the Christian community. Perhaps about 8% or 10% of our Christian Indian brethren have a national consciousness. In the rest there is a strange and sorry absence of the feeling of nationality, that thrilling sense that they are unique and that they are unique because they belong to the Indian nation; that the great heritage of the past belongs to them; that the future will be what they strive side by side with their countrymen and countrywomen to make it. They lack the spirit of nationalism because they have no feeling of nationality. There are scores of evidences of this sad fact of the abdication of nationality among the majority of Christian Indians. They prefer to identify themselves with the foreigners in matters of dress, although the feminine part of the Christian community has bravely withstood this folly. They try to imitate the foreigner in mode of living, in language, in cultural tastes, and in political sympathies. The Indian point of view does not appeal to them. They want to escape being identified with Indians. Often outlandish names cap these embodiments of denationalization. And when 'nationalism' is in vogue, some of the ambitious ones flaunt their parlour nationalism and expect, without paying even one-tenth of the price, to get the confidence of Indian nationalists. India has no use today for carpet knights. India needs those who are tried fighters. India calls those whose hearts leap at the sound of her agonized voice, and who reply,

Hail to Thee, Mother! thy proud sons greet thee,
Fair as the moon and as clear as the sun,
Terrible fair as a bannered army;
Patient and strong till the day be won;
Calling they sons to the high endeavour
Sealing them true to the task begun.

But how many of such Christian Nationalists are there in the whole peninsula.

The paucity of Christian nationalists in India is a phenomenon which can claim no parallel in any other country of the east or the west. Not that we want bellicose nationalists such as those of the west. But it is ironical that the religion of Jesus, the Prince of freedom-seeking nationalists, should have been the cause of our losing our sense of nationality and the capacity for nationalism. In fact, upto a few years ago, our religious teachers from the west frowned on any sort of participation by Christian Indians in political life, although their own brothers and sisters in the "homeland" took part in politics and yet presumably remained good Christian. The assertion that Christianity is against non-violent revolution, that Christianity is meant to teach the slave to be a better slave, and subject people to be better subject-people, and the rich to be better plutocrats bears the royal seal of the Devil himself. It can find no sanction in the original Gospel of Christ. It will be acceptable only to imperialists and capitalists. The contention, nay, the conviction put forth here is that Christianity, if it is true to the inspiration of its Founder's life, and to his teachings, must touch men and women with the fire of the noblest nationalism.

His plan for the Jews seems to have been that under his leadership, they should put aside all thoughts of vengeance, renounce the method of violence and by wholly non-violent resistance convert enemies into friends, and by his new strategy of religiopolitical action establish the great brotherhood, the "Kingdom of God," the divine Commonwealth in which love, liberty, and justice would prevail. It was a plan not of violent revolt but of revolutionary reconciliation. Would it be too much to say that this may also be his plan for India; and that through Mahatma Gandhi India has at length discovered it? Does it not impose a heavier nationalistic burden on Christian Indians?

As followers of Christ we are commanded to seek to establish the divine commonwealth on earth which implies that we must struggle for the political, economic, and moral rights of the disinherited, so that they might have a concrete evidence of the Fatherhood of God, believe in His love, and learn to serve Him, and with joy do His will. We must achieve right relations with God, mentally, spiritually, morally, and physically by using our physical, moral, mental and spiritual resources to establish justice on earth, so that our fellowmen are able to live the full and abundant life. And the vital, unquenchable inspiration must come from our contact with God. We cannot love God as positively and completely as Jesus commanded without realizing His universal Fatherhood. If God is the Father of all races He cannot be partial to one race but, rather with the loving heart of a Father wills that all His children, regardless of accidents of complexion, language, climate, geographical position, manners and customs, should enjoy the fruits of liberty, justice, and brotherhood, working together, facing dangers together, and together achieving for the good of all. If this is God's will, what is our duty?

We dare not exempt ourselves from fighting for the God-given rights of our countrymen and our fellowmen, to remove the causes of their poverty, malnutrition, and inequalities of opportunity, on the grounds that we love God and worship and serve him by going about "preaching" the Gospel. We must remind ourselves that the Founder of Christianity proclaimed the Gospel of Reconstruction—"The Lord's year of jubilee," which was according to the old Jewish Law the Sabbatical year, observed once in forty-nine, for redistribution of land, release of slaves, cancellation of debts and the beginning of a reconstructed life for the nation. And we must bear in mind how he proclaimed it, in what setting, with what accompaniments. It was done in the midst of untiring national service, healing, feeding, liberating. Jesus would have had to be a different sort of person to divorce action from theory, and to preach in a idealistic vacuum. We dare not exempt ourselves from action on behalf of the children of God. If we do so, we cease to love God, and love merely an idol of Him that we have made for our convenience and set up in our hearts. We either love and serve God as the universal Father and act accordingly, or our actions betray that we love our own image of God, made to suit our prejudices and interests. And when we do this we certainly do not "worship Him in Spirit and in truth", but carnally and falsely.

Fr. J. C. Winslow rightly observes, "There is still too much tendency to regard religion as an affair of the individual soul, and to ignore the larger obligations which it imposes. I think it is true that Indian Christians still need to develop a keen social consciousness. What is required is something parallel to the movement of 'Christian Socialism' associated with the names of Frederick Denison Maurice, Charles Kingsley and Henry Scott Holland in England in the last century, a movement which will see the redemption of society to be no less the end of religion than the redemption of the individual" (Dawn of Indian Freedom—p.202). When Christian Indians determine to live by Christ's Gospel of Reconstruction they will develop a keen social and national consciousness. And when this happens on a large scale, then indeed, we shall find the banner of Christian nationalism in the vanguard of our nation's sacred fight for justice and for liberty.

Indian Christianity will lack both perception and genuineness if it fails to recognize its great opportunity for co-operation in the national campaign. If, as we believe, original Christianity has a contribution to make to India, it must endeavour to begin making it in India's days of struggle and sorrow. Nothing but petty criticisms can be offered from outside. We need no gilt-edged invitations. We are Indians. Are we proud of our motherland with all her faults, not ignorant of the shortcomings of our countrymen or of the social practices of the land, but resolved to give our lives to change frailty into strength, captivity into freedom, evils into forms of good? Christian nationalists must be forthcoming, not one by one, but in appreciable numbers, who will enter the struggle, take their places side by side with their non-Christian comrades, and instil the Christ-conscience into Indian politics, into Indian public life, into the ranks of those who espouse the national cause, and prove that they are, like the best of their non-Christian comrades, above the enticements of reward, office, or power. If we have the unflinching initiative, the sturdy tenacity of purpose and the integrity of the Christ-Life, let us offer this contribution to India's national regeneration.

THE BOMBAY GOVERNMENT AND THE PRESS.

By thirty votes against three, the journalists of Bombay, at a specially requisitioned general meeting on Saturday September 30, reversed the decision of their Executive and condemned the recent Order of the Bombay Government on five newspapers of the city, banning them from publishing any news of the riot of August 1, or expressing any views on the Urban Immovable Property Tax.

The meeting was convened at the premises of the Journalists' Association of India, Queen's Mansion, Prescott Street, Bombay, at the requisition of 21 members and as, under the constitution of the Association, a month's notice to the members had to be given, the holding of the meeting was delayed. Mr. K. Natarajan presided.

Mr. E. G. Nair, moving the resolution, said that it was a protest against the high-handed order imposed on a section of the Bombay Press, restraining its liberty and violating the freedom of the Press which was its sacred right. Freedom of the Press was a right recognised in every democratic country of the world and any attempt to gag it amounted to a violation of the principles of Democracy. It was, therefore, imperative that a strong protest should be launched.

Mr. C. K. Narayanswami, seconding the resolution, declared that, though he was a Congressman himself, he was painfully compelled to condemn an order of a Congress Government, as he deemed that it was not only an infringement but a direct encroachment on the rights of the Press.

He pointed out that Section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was meant to be used against criminals, and as such should not be applied to the members of an honourable profession.

He was of the emphatic opinion that the course adopted by the Bombay Government, even in special circumstances, was absolutely uncalled for and unjustifiable.

Messrs. Mahashabde and Ghate vehemently opposed the resolution and argued that the order was quite justified and necessary in the exceptional circumstances which prevailed then. And especially as the order was a fiat of the popular Government it had to be tolerated. Mr. M. B. Rao said that it was too late to protest against the order.

Messrs. Subba Rao, Batuk Desai, Acharya, Kabadi. Karai and M. Dadachanji also supported the resolution.

Mr. B. G. Horniman speaking in support of the resolution observed: "The resolution seems like flogging a dead horse. It has been decided by the Chief Justice of Bombay in very scathing language that the Government's order tampered with the freedom of the Press. In my mind the order has left a stain on Bombay journalism and journalists. I, therefore, think that it is very necessary to support the resolution unanimously. Censorship of news in war time may be excusable. I would rather walk out of my office, and be a footpath-sleeper than have my writings submitted to the censorship of the Public Relations Officer or for that matter even a Minister of the Government.

"When after my deportation from India censorship was imposed on the "Bombay Chronicle" edited by Mr. Brelvi, the only self-respecting response was that the leading columns of the paper were left blank until the Government returned to its senses. I feel that the resolution should have been couched in stronger terms of condemnation. I think that Mr. Munshi went far out of the way of his powers to impose restrictions on the freedom of the Press.', Concluding, Mr. Horniman paid a tribute to the Chief Justice for upholding the liberty of the Press.

Mr. S. A. Brelvi said that, though the constitution of the Association prevented the meeting being held earlier, the time factor had no bearing on the issue before them which was the preservation of the liberty of the Press. As journalists, it was their duty to assert that liberty and oppose all encroachment on it. That the order was passed by a Congress Ministry made it doubly the duty of those of them who, like him, were Congressmen throughout their public life and wished well to the Congress, to act towards it as true friends. It was the duty of a true friend to point out the mistake of his friend and thus truly befriend him though the performance of such a duty might be very painful. If they were to be true to the principle of the liberty of the Press for which Congress itself had fought ever since its inception, they must, in the interest of the Congress itself which they loved, perform that painful duty.

The resolution was then voted upon and carried by thirty votes to three.

The following is the text of the resolution:—

"Resolved that in the opinion of the Journalists' Association of India the order of the Chief Presidency Magistrate issued on the 1st August under Section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure directing five specified newspapers to abstain from publishing any news, articles or comments relating to the riot that took place that day or any other riot which might have occurred or may occur in the course of the next two months and to any agitation or protests against the Urban Immoveable Property Tax is highly objectionable.

"On the ground of principle as an infringement of the legitimate right and duty of the Press to report and comment on current events and on questions of public interest and importance, the due exercise of which right and due discharge of which duty is essential to the growth and maintenance of civil freedom and ordered government based on law and not on the individual sentiments of any person in authority."

It will be remembered that this resolution was placed before the Executive Committee of the Association when the order was issued but it was rejected by a majority of votes and Mr. S. A Brelvi, Chairman of the Executive Committee, one of the Secretaries and three members of the Committee as well as Mr. K. Natarajan, President and Mr. B. G. Horniman, Vice-President of the Association had resigned in protest.

The meeting of the Association held on Saturday also passed a resolution moved by Mr. R. K. Prabhu and seconded by Mr. M. B. Rao appointing a deputation to meet Mahatma Gandhi, the President and members of the Congress Parliamentary Committee, the Premier and Home Member of Bombay asking them to urge the Central Government to repeal the Press Emergency Powers Act and suggesting in the meanwhile to Congress Ministries not to resort to it and that whenever it was considered necessary to take any action against the press it must take the form of prosecution in a court under the ordinary law and not of an executive fiat.

Mr. Natarajan left the chair to oppose this resolution. He said that Gandhiji and the Parliamentary Board were party organs without a recognised constitutional standing and that the Association which was claiming a constitutional right should not go behind the responsible Ministers. He expressed his pleasure at the meeting passing by an overwhelming majority the resolution of protest which been thrown out by the Managing Committee and thus vindicating the rights of the Press. He added that, nevertheless, he was not withdrawing his resignation of the Presidentship which he had submitted. As the hour was late he left the meeting.

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. NOTES.

Sigmund Freud :—Dr. Sigmund Freud, the famous discoverer of the treatment of nervous disorders by the method known as psycho-analysis, died in London on Saturday at the age of 83. The idea underlying his method is that these disorders are the effect of some repression of a desire cherished at some time past, seeking expression in an abnormal manner. His theory has undergone much modification at the hands of contemporary psychologists. The popular idea of it is that repression is harmful and, as a corollary, freedom of self-expression should have a large place in the bringing up and education of children. This is perfectly sound but it is sometimes pushed to absurd lengths as, for instance, when the Archbishop of Bombay cited it against Prohibition. Another perversion of it, to a certain extent due to the examples of Dr. Freud himself, is to accord the sexual impulse the central place in human nature. The illustrations given by Dr. Freud in proof of his doctrine are several of them highly forced. For instance, he held that "slips of the tongue" had more importance as indices of a man's disposition than his conscious utterances. With this idea he encouraged his patients to talk at random and tell him everything that happened to come to their minds during a sitting. When he found that this often yielded fantastic results he turned to dreams as a surer index and got his patients to recall all the dreams which they had dreamt. For interpretation of dreams he developed a highly complicated technique. His deductions might have been true of the Viennese but they were utterly unreliable as indications of the working of minds brought up in a system in which religion occupied the centre. Dr. Freud's books were burnt by the Nazis as embodying a degenerate philosophy. He himself had to leave Vienna where his life's work was done, and seek asylum in London. His last book is devoted to proving that Moses was not a Jew but an Egyptian and that what has come down through the centuries as the religion of the Jews, was derived originally from Egyptian sources. Dr. Freud was a Jew by birth rather than from conviction. "My parents were Jews and I have remained a Jew," he said. Even in his early days, long before the Nazis came on the scene, he had bitter experience of the anti-Semitic prejudice in Austria. In fact, it was at the University, the home of culture, that he first tasted it. He wrote of this experience :

> I could never grasp why I should be ashamed of my origin or, as they began to say, of my 'race'. As to the nationality which was denied me, I gave this up without much regret. But this first university impressions produced one very important result for the future. I became familiar early with my destiny—to belong to the opposition and to be proscribed from the compact majority. A certain independent judgment was in this way developed.

Warsaw Surrenders :—After a heroic resistance of twenty-two days, Warsaw was to surrender on conditions to the Germans on Friday. The sufferings of the population during the last three days under a constant shower of incendiary bombs, were terrible. The last straw that brought the gallant defenders to supplicate for peace, seems to have been the scarcity of water. While there can be nothing but admiration for the Polish patriots, one can not but regret that Great Britain and France were unable to offer direct help to the beleaguered garrison and had to content themselves with trying to divert a part of the German army by attacks on the fortifications on the Franco-German frontier. Should they not have advised the Polish leaders not to sacrifice the flower of their Army in trying to defend what was all too plainly an indefensible position ? Since the object of the war is now declared to be the destruction of Hitlerism, was it necessary to involve the relatively weak Polish nation in it? Anyhow, Poland is now out of it and Polish independence is no longer in issue. Even if the Nazis can be turned out of the western part of Poland which they have allotted to themselves, the Eastern and larger half of the country which has been absorbed by Russia, cannot be restored to a resurrected Poland. The population seems to have welcomed the Soviet troops as deliverers. The Sovietisation of the territory, which is proceeding apace, will render its reclamation by any future Polish regime impossible. An episode in the story of Poland's loss of independence, which is not without its humourous side, is the appropriation of £. 25 millions of Poland's gold reserve which was being sent out of the country through Rumania, by the latter as security for the expenses incurred by it on the large number of refugees from the devastated country pouring into Rumania. It is not unlikely that Herr Hitler will lay claim to this gold and there may be another country added to the list of those whose independence has proved illusory.

This Independence:—Those who raised the slogan of Independence in Indian politics and profess it still, might consider the fate of the three countries which twenty years ago achieved it. They are European countries too, which were protected by the till recently accepted maxim that the White man is entitled to, and always has the capacity inherent in him to, govern himself. First in the list is Austria which had Independence thrust on her against her strong desire to be united to the German Reich. Next was Czechoslovakia which had enjoyed a large measure of autonomy in the Austrian Empire. Herr Hitler in his "Mein Kampf" repeatedly complains that the Czechs were shown undue partiality by the Imperial Government. Mr. Masaryk, who later became President of Czechoslovakia, was an influential member of the Austrian Parliament and for long his aspiration was only the attainment of something like Dominion Status within the Empire. If he and his countrymen had stood by the Empire in the crisis of the last War, the Empire and Czecho-Slovakia would have emerged from it purified and invigorated. Unfortunately other counsels prevailed and the Czechs were persuaded to join the enemies of the Empire. Czech regiments which had taken the oath of fealty to the Emperor and wore the Imperial uniform, deserted as soon as they reached the war front and went over to the enemy and even offered their services to him. For this service to the cause of democracy, Czechoslovakia was created an independent Republic twenty years ago. Last year it surrendered its independence on the advice and at the insistence of the leading Allies in the last War. And now comes Poland. After twenty years of fevered existence, this unfortunate country is again partitioned among its old masters. The imminent fall of Warsaw ends another inglorious chapter in European history. No one likes slavery, but a thing does not become slavery by being merely called slavery. The Indian people realise that they have enjoyed more freedom under British rule than under its predecessors and that they are enjoying more freedom today than their kith and kin in the neighbouring Indian States. To oppose Independence is easily represented as hugging the chains of slavery and it is not pleasant to be so represented. That is why many people who do not believe in the Independence goal being anywhere in the range of practical politics, do not come forward to express their dissent. But now that matters are taking a serious turn, they have all emerged from their seclusion a silence and manifested in various ways t desire to be of help, at any rate not to b source of embarrassment, to the British Emp The only difference, and as we have shown i no difference at all but really a matter phrasing, is while the Princes and Gand declare their offers to be absolute, the politi and communal organisations offer suggesti with a view to make their co-operation perfe Even Mr. Subhas Bose can not covet the fate Poland for his country.

"Delivering the Goods":—An orthodox Hin friend of the old school was fond of proving t validity for all time of the varnashrama fourfold caste by pointing to the history civilisation. In the first period, mankin according to him, was ruled by wise and selfl men. This was the golden age. Next ca the rule of might when the man of blood a iron dominated human affairs. The third, wa the age of Commerce when everything wa measured by its money value and the riche man and nation dominated poorer men and weak nations. The fourth and last stage, in friend's scheme, was foreshadowed by the Labo movement. He did not live to see Soviet revolution in Russia, or he would ha hailed it as the crowning proof of theory. The age of Commercialism has n ended. The European struggle may be inte preted as the struggle between it and t Labour age which has to supersede it. The struggle is bound to be long and bitter. Th extent to which commercialism has penetrate outside its legitimate sphere, is shown by t so-called dowry system in marriage against whi reformers have been fulminating for ma years past without much effect. In the field politics, commercialism has left its stain in t hateful phrase "delivering the goods." We do not know when this was first introduced in political terminology. In India its vogue is comparatively recent. One never heard th phrase from Sir Pherozeshah Mehta Gokhale. What are the "goods"? Who is th salesman? What is the price? The "goods in the context can only mean the mass voters. The man who can deliver the "goods is the one who can somehow get these most illiterate, inarticulate beings to vote for h nominees at the elections, often by promise which are not meant to be kept and, as a matte of fact, are not expected to be kept. The 'price depends on the state of the market, which means on the relative urgencies of the buyer and the seller, the former to buy, the latter to sell. In a famous book "Compromise" published in the latter half of the la century, John Morley deplored the tendency in his time to apply political standards th that is to say, the counting of heads as the criterion of right and wrong, to intellectual an even religious domains. Politics at that time was only just beginning to come under the influen of the commercial age. But commercialism was in the air. "We are not cotton spinners all," protested Tennyson, "some love England and her honour yet." Even in the Poet's lifetime, in spite of the protests of men like him, Carlyle, Ruskin and others. Cotton had become the dominating factor in British and Indian politics. It has, indeed, been the main battle ground on which Indo-British interests have fought each other for over half a century. The one thing that will remove antagonism and sweeten the relations between the two countries, is the elimination of the commercial spirit in their dealings with each other. Their motto should be not caveat emptor but "Do unto others as you would wish them to do unto you."

A Word to the Viceroy :—Lord Linlithgow and the Secretary of State are considering what action they should take on the Congress Working Committee's resolution bearing on India's position in reference to the War. Lord Zetland said in the House of Lords that it was too abstract and that he was waiting to get a concrete interpretation of it from the Viceroy as the result of personal talks with leaders. As a matter of fact, there is nothing abstract about it. It consists of a number of general propositions, each concrete in itself, but it fails to provide a thread on which all or most of these can be strung into the semblance of an intelligible programme which might furnish a basis of action. It is loaded with surplusage and is, therefore, inartistic, palpably so, and that is no doubt why Gandhiji felt it necessary to stress its artistic character. It may also be that the Working Committee's resolution has been purposely left vague in order to admit of a wide scope for adjustment in negotiation with the British Government. However that may be, Lord Linlithgow and the Secretary of State would do well to avoid anything savouring of a 'deal' with any party, because it claims to be able to "deliver the goods." Every stable constitution must rest on a stable social foundation. Social conditions in India were never more disorganised than they are today owing to various causes, not the least of them being the Hoare Federation scheme. In consequence, a party which honestly believes and promises that it can deliver the goods might find in the course of the next few months that it cannot keep its engagement. The only safe course for Government is to proceed on sound principles and on a correct estimate of the raison d'etre of its own existence in this country. It will take long to discuss this point in detail. Broadly speaking, British rule in this country had answered the much-felt want of a power which would control the fissiparous tendencies of religion, language, sect, caste and province, and establish a unity which would give the country the strength to discharge her mission to the world. In other words, the polity which India needs is one which would exert a steady and imperceptible pressure on all divisions so as to mould them into an organic whole. This the British Government in India did through the greater part of the nineteenth century. Every foreign rule is under an overwhelming temptation to find and act along lines of cleavage. If it yields to it, it renounces the great mission of Empire which is to promote a synthesis of varieties of race and culture. The scheme of the Government of India Act must be recast so as to resume this main purpose. One essential condition of it is that it should know no differences of citizenship The equality of all men before the law should be real and specific. All weightages and preferences are contrary to the healthy functioning of a true Empire.

An Assistant Viceroy?—Surely the gossip retailed by the Simla correspondent of the Pioneer that Lord Hailey is to be sent out to India as Assistant Viceroy to help Lord Linlithgow to cope with his task, rendered heavier than usual by the War in Europe, is too preposterous to be suggested even as a possibility. For one thing, Lord Hailey is, we believe, an older man than Lord Linlithgow. Most of his manhood has been spent in working the bureaucratic machine in this country. When the late Mr. Montagu conceived the idea of introducing a sort of Parliamentary system in India, Lord Hailey was one of the few senior British Civil servants who grasped the opportunity which it afforded for his special talents. Naturally a good speaker, not averse to hearing his own voice like most of his fellow civilians, his ingenuity enabled him to pursue by parliamentary methods the identical ends which the bureaucracy has been pursuing since the Ilbert Bill controversy made India politically conscious. The most striking display of these qualities which he gave when he was Home Member of the Government of India, was the ingenious interpretation of the Declaration of 1917 to which we referred last week. If the object is really to assist Lord Linlithgow, and not to plant by his side an agent of the Imperial Government to act as a brake on what might be felt in Whitehall to be His Excellency's excessive consideration for Indian sentiments, the proper thing would be to appoint an Indian of ability, experience and integrity who will also serve as a medium to bring the Viceroy into closer touch with the currents of Indian life in their deeper levels beneath the froth and foam of politics. His Excellency has impressed the people as a wise and understanding statesman intent on doing justice to India. Lord Hailey will be more an embarrassment than a help at this juncture to Lord Linlithgow and the country.

Congress and Co-operation :—A statement by Gandhiji published on Friday shows that the condition on which Congress would offer its co-operation in the War, is that it should be enabled at once to tell the people that Independence will be granted to India at the end of the War. Gandhiji himself was prepared to offer co-operation unconditionally. The condition is obviously meant to satisfy Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru under whose Presidentship the banner of Independence was first unfurled by the Congress. From the debate in the House of Lords this week, it appears further that Congress Governments in the provinces will resign if this condition is not accepted.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, September 30, 1939.

ITALY AND THE WAR.

After the German troops crossed the Polish frontier on the 1st September and before Mr. Chamberlain announced from the Cabinet Room in 10, Downing Street that Great Britain was at war with Germany, Signor Mussolini made a last minute attempt to avert its outbreak. He sent a proposal to the French, British and German Governments for adjudicating the Polish-German dispute at a Conference of the five Governments, namely, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Poland. France, it was reported, agreed. Germany wanted to know if the British message transmitted to her the day before was an ultimatum and asked for twenty-four hours' extension of the time limit. Great Britain rightly made it a condition that German troops should be withdrawn from Polish territory before the Conference. Herr Hitler in his speech at Danzig last week laid the responsibility of the war on the British Government which did not agree to Signor Mussolini's proposal. Speaking in the House of Commons on Monday the British Premier did not directly contradict the Reich Chancellor's statement. He referred Herr Hitler to the statement of an Italian news agency on the 4th September to prove that the French and British Governments' position with reference to Signor Mussolini's proposals was identical. Even if this was not the case, the British demand would still have been perfectly correct; and France anyhow accepted it as such.

On the 23rd September addressing his party in Rome, Signor Mussolini threw out a suggestion that further extension of the war might be averted by accepting the extinction of Polish independence as a settled fact. "Europe," he said, "is not yet in effect at war. A clash may be avoided by the realisation that the desire to maintain or, worse still, to reconstitute the position which history and the natural dynamism of the peoples have condemned, was a vain illusion." Signor Mussolini added that the failure of Britain and France to declare war against Russia on her invading Poland, weakened their moral case in fighting Germany. On the last point, Mr. Chamberlain told the House of Commons that they had not before them all the materials yet for judging the consequences of Russia's aggression, implying that the question of war with Russia was not finally settled. The Times, however, has come forward with a justification for ignoring the hard fact that Russia is now firmly established over more than half of Poland. It argues that Great Britain has undertaken to destroy Hitlerism and that the fate of Poland is merely a side issue which should not be allowed to distract them from their appointed task. But the Pact with Poland expressly provided that "should one of the contracting parties become engaged in hostilities with an European Power in consequence of aggression by the latter, the other contracting party will immediately give the party engaged in hostilities all support and assistance in its power." His Majesty's Government, in view of the responsibility that rests upon them for a vast and variegated Empire, is wise not to declare war hastily against Russia while that with Germany is entering upon its most crucial phase. Such abstention can be justified on one of three grounds but not on that advanced by the Times of India. It may be contended that the Pact contemplates aggression by an European Power and not two; that Russia is not a European Power and has often excluded itself from that category; and that it is not in the power of Britain or France to give immediately all or any support to Poland.

The first would be quibbling. The second would be inconsistent on the part of Britain and France although it might have been advanced by Germany which, however, has come forward to acknowledge Russia as the other great European Power besides herself. The third is the real reason. Mr. Chamberlain in his speech in the House of Commons was perhaps thinking of it when he declared that His Majesty's Government would not engage in a military operation which had not the approval of their Army experts. It may also be urged that Russia has invaded Poland and taken over the Eastern half of the country in pursuance of a pact with Germany who is, therefore, the actual offender. Neither of these pleas, however, will satisfy the Poles that Great Britain and France have kept their promise to her. Dr. E. Banasinski, the Polish Consul-General in an interview to the Bombay Chronicle, spoke as if he regarded Russia's as the more reprehensible part in the destruction of his country's freedom. He declared that Poland would have resisted Germany even without the promise of assistance from the British and French Governments. "Our army," he said, "would have been able to keep the Germans at bay by dragging them deep into the country and by extending their lines of communication hundreds of miles, over territory where heavy guns and tanks would have been rendered more than useless by the condition of the roads and marshy areas. The Polish army's strategy was to prolong the fight till the rain and the weather and their own mobile technical equipment would assist them considerably." This plan was foiled by what the Consul-General called "the stab from the back" by Russia.

The C. P. Ministry and Mr. Modak:—Mr. Cyril Modak in his letter to the Reformer which was published last week, quoted approvingly, as proof of the "revolutionary" urge still behind the Congress, the Central Provinces Ministers as saying to him that they did not belong to the positions they occupied and that they longed to get back to the streets, the shish (?) and the struggle. This is not surprising in view of the perpetual trouble into which one minister after the other in the C. P. is always getting. The passion for "revolution" shown by these politicians, therefore, may be attributed not uncharitably to their finding the ministerial shoes too big for them.

REFLECTIONS ON THE WAR.

(By Wayfarer).

The War has given rise to many self-questionings. Have I to any degree, however trivial, been instrumental in bringing on this calamity on the world? Could I have done anything to avert it? Now that it has come, what precisely should be my attitude to it? Can I do anything to cut it short or at least to minimise its cruelties? What is my duty to the British Empire to which I belong? What should be my feelings towards the Germans against whom it is waging war?

Statesmen in their broadcasts proclaim that the attitude of the individual citizen is a factor for the successful prosecution of the war. Dictators do this as much as democrats. They mean by this, however, no more than that the citizen should pay his taxes, bear with his deprivations, allow himself or his sons to be conscripted without grumbling. The Poles have done all this but that has not prevented them from being defeated by the Germans who also have done the same things. It is clear, therefore, that success and defeat does not depend upon the material sacrifices of the individual citizen. Other things being equal, the country with a larger population will triumph over one with a smaller population, if material strength is the only criterion. The smaller country must always be the prey of the larger country. If it is not, it must be only because the bigger country finds it more profitable to let the smaller be, or because it is afraid of the jealousy of other Great Powers if it should seek to swallow up its smaller neighbour.

If some large countries are subject to small countries, it is because the former do not regard political freedom as the supreme good and have not equipped themselves with the weapons of destruction without which no nation nowadays can hope to retain its freedom. When a nation, big or small, feels that, above everything else political and economic freedom is the one thing which matters, it will have no great difficulty in procuring the armaments needed from any of the industrialised countries, if it can not immediately manufacture them itself. Gandhiji's non-violent plan which, in the last resort, reduces itself to witholding of taxes, is very effective as a means of paralysing an existing Government but it can not create or sustain a stable one. This is clear from the fact that Congress Governments in some provinces have to put down satyagraha against themselves by the same means as those employed by the previous bureaucratic regime. By the way, this method has not succeeded anywhere outside British India, not even in Indian States where it might have been expected to be more effective if it were really an indigenous invention, as outsiders take it to be. Political independence, as it is commonly understood, cannot be won by satyagraha. If the British Indian Government is unable to collect taxes because the people refuse to pay and it can not get a sufficient number of police and revenue officials to enforce payment, it will have to quit the country. This contingency, however, was never more remote than now. The Congress Governments in the provinces are collecting the taxes and more of them with greater vigour than formerly, and the Congress High Command is ready and indeed anxious to do the same at the Centre also. The British Government seems increasingly to appreciate the fact that the Independence which the Congress asks is not incompatible with its own interests. Mr. Subhas Bose will in course of time arrive at the same point as Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has done. And this is precisely where the Congress was twenty-five years ago only instead of Setalvad, Srinivasa Sastry and Chintamani, we have Rajendra Prasad, Abul Kalam Azad and Sardar Patel to guide the country, with Gandhiji in the background. The goal is the same though called by a different name. Freedom in the Indian sense which can be won by satyagraha and by it alone, is, altogether different. It is Freedom from Anger, Greed and Hatred. A State whose citizens have won this freedom, will be Swarajya which means not only self-government but also and even more the negation of a desire to dominate others. It will be not only at peace with itself but will also be the most potent instrument for securing world peace. Freedom from greed and hatred does not necessarily exclude physical violence. Physical force in itself is neither moral nor immoral. It is the motive which inspires its use that invests it with a moral quality. Instead of attacking the motives which make it morally reprehensible, Gandhiji and his followers have understood it in the purely negative sense of abstention from physical violence. It is because the individual citizens in the belligerent States have not, most of them, won Freedom from Anger, Greed and Hatred, that the States themselves feel bound to retain their belligerent character, even when there is no war.

Mr. Chamberlain's War to end Hitlerism will be no more successful in its object than President Wilson's War to end War and to make the world safe for democracy. Hitlerism is a symptom. not the cause of the present confusion. Fascism is the immediate forerunner of Hitlerism and though at present it is lying low, it is not to be left out of account. Then there is Stalinism. The Power which succeeds in conquering all these, will itself end by developing a new and more virulent sort of totalitarianism. Col. Lindbergh's warning that if the United States tried to save democracy in Europe, they will end by ceasing to be a democracy themselves, is a wise and timely warning. The futility of war as a means of settling international disputes, needs no proof. It is admitted and accepted by every one, but all the same it still remains the one resort of all nations which have arms with which they can enforce their claims. Everybody is ready to disarm if someone else shows the way. As nobody wants to do this, disarmament has remained a pious hope while rearmament has gone on at a feverish pace. It is obvious that Europe left to itself can not get out of this vicious circle, nor can America help, because America has not as yet emancipated itself from its European heritage. In Asia is the only hope. Here also Japan has fallen a victim to the European craze. China can help greatly. But the task immediately must be taken on hand by India which has in the British Empire in which she is placed, a lever by which she can operate world affairs. Thus our position in the Empire is a distinct advantage for the task which falls to us. Our influence must be steadily and persistently exerted to strengthen the anti-war sentiments in the Commonwealth and to counteract the forces which make for greed and hatred among the nations. Each individual can do his little part in this task. In fact, this is an individual's work more than that of organizations.

To return to the question with which I began. "The importance of the infinitesimal," was a phrase very current about the end of the last century. It was applied to moral as well as material concerns. Its truth is proved by the minute organisms such as vitamins and bacteria which for good or evil play an important part in our lives. So too in the lives of nations the individual, however insignificant, has, I am convinced, a deciding role. Indeed it is a commonplace of ancient Indian thought that every living being is a function of the Universe and the regular working of the Cosmic Order depends upon every one of them discharging its appointed task faithfully. Following these trains of thought I feel that if I had been more free from anger and hatred than I am, there might have been an infinitesimally less—greater strength in the forces against war, and who knows that minute addition might have turned the scale in favour of rational methods. The individual citizen can best help to promote the cause of peace by the same means of self-discipline and by using his influence great or small to eliminate these passions from State policy. My attitude towards the enemy countries should also be governed by the same principle. This war is not going to last for ever. It is the duty of every loyal citizen to strive every nerve to see it brought to an end at the earliest possible moment.

A POLITICO-LITERARY PARABLE.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

Hamlet and King Lear, the plays no less than the heroes, are the greatest instances of creative effort in literary art. The contradictions of life are left unsolved in both of them. The Tempest is a noble attempt at reconciliation, but with the help of powers and of beings which are not of this world. Whether this world in which we live is a multiverse or a universe, philosophers are arguing about. Practical men base their lives and their actions in the faith that it is a universe. Pandit Nehru is undoubtedly the finest and the highest example of Indian culture, Gandhiji being a 'thing apart' outside and above such measuring rods. Nehru probably believes in a universe and in that belief imagines that socialism or communism will solve all human contradictions and instal a millenium without the present contradictions but as he is also endowed with Hamlet's powers of analysis and thinking and has his qualities (or defects ?) of introspection and a sensitive conscience, it is impossible for the Pandit to advocate, much less establish, communism with the ruthlessness of Lenin and Stalin; and without ruthlessness and instant decisions, large scale results are not possible in this mad, or at least surprising, world of ours.

The sum and substance of my own personal conclusion—after watching men and events, intellectual and spiritual forces without bias much longer than Nehru—is that Lenin and Stalin, Gandhiji and Nehru, have not discovered a final panacea for this World's ills, and no such panacea is discoverable. Some forty years ago, writing anonymously in this journal, I expressed the hope that God would take birth again among men for removing suffering and injustice. That is still my hope, and I have no other.

If, however, men realize the impossibility of any 'ism' whatsoever removing all injustice, and simultaneously realise the need for ceaseless effort for improving living conditions, common sense, good will, compromise on steadily rising levels, and faith being the instruments, much of the present suffering and injustice will disappear. The Greeks, I am told, called this the Golden Mean. Dr. Larsen styled it, perhaps more appropriately, as the central poise between opposing enthusiasms—making use of both ends of the pole, but allowing neither to overcome the other.

Pandit Nehru is a master of fine sentiments, and of fine phrasing. But he could never excel Hamlet in those respects. If his father's ghost ever appears to him, from what little I knew of the father, I feel persuaded that he would advise his son that the time is inopportune for words—what is required is instant decision and immed[iate] action.

Pandit Nehru condemns Hitlerism as stro[ngly] as does Neville Chamberlain. Could the P[andit] think of any method other than Chamberlain's overcoming it, as hamletism can never successful against it. What Chamberlain proposed is that the war would be stopped as as the German people adopt a form of Governm[ent] which would listen to reason and arbitration, wi[th] word could be trusted, and who would undo wrongs executed by force—wrongs which Pa[ndit] Nehru condemns even more strongly. It is easy criticise imperialism and to condemn Chamberl[ain's] previous record. The counts are all there, Liber[als] and Socialists in England have agreed that t[hey] are all subject for all criticism or condemnation. could add a personal count—viz. that I had sho[wn] ten years ago a method which was approved by t[he] experts, and generally approved by the Governm[ent] of India, which, if considered and adopted w[ith] suitable modifications, would have enabled I[ndia] to enjoy Dominion Status and co-operate w[ith] England like other Dominions.

The time, however, is not one for recrimination, is the effects on India and the world and on Hi[s] which are more relevant, and which I am sure t[he] the Pandit's father would agree to be far m[ore] important. I dislike similes, as they often misl[ead] and never altogether suit the occasion. The i[dea] which is being advocated in this article is like[ly] however, to become clearer with the help o[f] simile. Suppose that a ward, who has reach[ed] majority is living in a house adjacent to his guardia[n] but ownership of which has not been granted b[y] the slow-moving guardian. Suppose also that t[he] guardian's house has caught fire or was perha[ps] set fire to, and that sparks are flying from it to t[he] ward's house. The ward would be considered very foolish person indeed if he argues about t[he] past misdoings of the guardian instead of helping putting out the fire. If Hitler succeeds and Engla[nd] goes under—which God forbid—there would be end., within a few months, of India's security, and end also of all the Congress governments. The terr[or] that would overtake India is unthinkable.

Pandit Nehru's masterly statement would have been in order if he had first promised co-operation this hour of dire need, and afterwards set out all t[he] grievances crying for redress. Perhaps he kno[ws] his Englishman much better than I do; and I f[ear] that younger India including even pacific youths, a[re] entirely with the Pandit. Perhaps I am out of da[te] and the sentiments which I have cherished, are al[so] antiquated. Nevertheless I trust that your larg[e] hearted and tolerant paper will find a place f[or] them.

MAHATMA GANDHI QUALIFIES HIS NON-VIOLENCE.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

It seems at times that Mahatma Gandhi has not yet completely got out of the state of impulsiveness that follows one's enthusiasm for a newly conceived idea—in his case the idea of non-violence. So long as this impulsiveness lasts, the idea does not crystallise, and its realisation does not go far and deep. Its conceiver goes about skimming over the surface, falling into misconceptions and inconsistencies and hurrying into misapplications and unthought-out interpretations. When an idea comes, it is therefore necessary to concentrate deeply on it so as to be able to realise its all sided implications and its possible stretch in different directions. In the case of an idea like that of non-violence in thought, deed and word, which involves a firm ruling of the mind and elevation of outlook above the common influences of sorroundings, such concentration and realisation become imperative. Gandhiji must no doubt be always trying to appreciate what in its fullness Ahimsa means while preaching and amplifying it in individual as well as in national and international political relationship. But in some unguarded moments and perhaps under environmental influence, he unwittingly steps away out of the compass of the ahimsa idea. An instance of such stepping away I want to bring to the notice of him and of those, who follow the trend of his thoughts on non-violence.

Not long ago, at the time of the German ill-treatment of the Jews, and again at the time of the German thrust into the country of the Slovaks Gandhiji offered the prescription of non-violence to the oppressed people advising them not to think of armed resistance, but only to adopt the method of non-violent satyagraha for melting the heart of the aggressors. That advice accorded well with his doctrines of satyagraha as a weapon against violence and evil. In his own country, against the aggressiveness of the Muslims he offered to give a blank cheque on behalf of the Hindus. His conception of non-violence has led him into such thoughts and deeds. Now, however, in offering sympathy and perhaps also moral support to the countries which have adopted violent means against the violent aggression of Germany, he has to all intents and purposes supported the use of violence against violence, and has thereby violently upset the basic premises of his satyagraha. He does not advise non-violence to the Poles or to the countries allied in their support. He rather pleads for sympathy for the adopters of violent methods of defence and even disapproves the imposition of any qualification or condition on the giving of such sympathy and support. So far as his own political party, the Indian Congress is concerned, he adds,—by way, it seems, of an after-thought rather than of a first inspiration.—that the Congress being pledged to non-violence can give only non-violent or rather moral support to the powers ranged against the attackers of Poland.

But is not the giving of moral support to a wrong or an evil, the same thing as the actual doing of it, from the point of view of even common law, not to say of that of high moral ethics? Is not a person giving such support to a criminal, a thief or a murderer, guilty in the eyes of law, no matter whether he actually draws blood with his hand or not? Will his defence that he was himself non-violent throughout absolve him of his complicity in the crime? If common law would only take cognizance of his actual act of support, active or constructive, violent or non-violent, moral law would also look into his mind and thoughts to judge his liability.

From the point of view of common law and also more from the point of view of moral law, which forms the essential foundation of the principle of satyagraha, therefore, Gandhiji's sympathy and support amount to little less than violence themselves.

Sympathy for Poland is all right; support for those, who go to her help, is commendable; but when extending such support and sympathy a non-violent satyagrahi must ask those who receive them to free them from the stain on them, if any, of violence which the satyagrahi wants to subdue by love. To subdue and conquer the spirit of violence by love, is indeed the idea of a non-violent satyagraha and not to suppress violence by more effective violence or to overpower a blood-stained fist by one also coloured red.

That such thoughts have escaped Gandhiji, is rather surprising; but a man with his softness of heart can well be overcome by emotions at the sight of suffering and oppression and at such moments he may even transgress the limits imposed on his thoughts and activities by the doctrines he has himself conceived, accepted and idealised. When, moreover, he is directly appealed to for sympathy and support he may even forget himself and what he stands for.

HERE AND NOW.

(By Cyril Modak.)

The dualism of the European tradition has its roots in ancient Greece and Rome. Christianity could not escape from this dualistic mode of thought which is responsible for many antics of interpretation. These antics were a direct reaction to the demands of power, either political or economic. Slaves had to be converted and yet soothed and kept from rebelling against their brutal masters and the brutal system which blessed slavery. Subject peoples had to be converted and yet mollified and kept from openly revolting against the tyranny of their rulers and the insane system of imperialism. European Christianity achieved the impossible by its antics of interpretation. At every revolutionary point of Christ's teachings an other-worldly construction served to silence the dispossessed, absolve the rich and powerful, and put the seal of divine approval on the status quo.

Thus all the inequalities between man and man, the gross inequalities of social status and economic advantages, of opportunities for training and advancement and choice of vocation, cunning inequalities proposed by the selfishness of man, were exalted as the dictates of the will of God. And the dazzling consolation offered was that man's earthly life was a brief probation for eternal life where earthly suffering would be rewarded by shining joy, where earthly poverty would be rewarded by flashing crowns, where earthly frustrations and disappointments would find delectable satisfaction. Riches were sneered at in the presence of the poor. All the privileges and advantages that animate men to strive against odds were treated with scorn in the presence of the unprivileged. This world's goods were theoretically derided. And all the time the rich grabbed at riches and the privileged safeguarded their privileges. The tide of discontentment was stemmed by a wall built by priests, with many texts, the key-stone of which probably was "Get treasure in heaven that never fails, that no thief can get at, no moth destroy. For where your treasure lies your heart will lie there too." (Luke: XII. 33-34)

But does the "heaven" of this verse refer to the Hereafter, some bright and happy abode beyond the clouds filled with refulgent seraphims and dulcet harps? Is it only beyond the grave that moths do not destroy nor thieves break in and steal? It is amazing and a little perplexing that so many sermons can be found on this verse with an other worldly interpretation. The context of the verse, which is not questioned by the most authoritative scholars, makes a "heavenly" explanation quite exotic and somewhat quixotic! The preceding verse ends by saying "fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom." Surely, few progressive men and women today seriously doubt that the "Kingdom of God" implies God's divine order here and now, on this planet of ours convulsed with war and hate and misery, for it is here that it is needed. It is here that Jesus came to establish the New Order based on co-operation, love, and mutual sharing. The Hebrew prophetic tradition had never visualised a "Kingdom of God" somewhere beyond the grave but realistically on this earth. Those to whom Jesus addressed his massage of "the Kingdom of God" were trained by Hebraic prophecy to understand nothing 'but the New Israel on earth,' God's New Covenant with the Jews here on earth. The Jewish prophetic consciousness hardly ever thought of "immortality," but did envisage the "Kingdom of heaven" here and now, in a thoroughly "this-worldly" sense. As that keen thinker, Prof. John Macmurray says, "It is the absence of contrast between this world and another world, between the spiritual and the material, between the ideal and the actual, which is characteristic of the Hebrew religious culture." (Clue To History—P. 31.)

Having thus assured his hearers of God's will and desire to bestow His New Order upon men here and now, would Jesus, in the next verse, take a sportive sommersault, for no reason save perverse self-gratification, and tell the same hearers that they should turn their gaze towards the land of shades? Would it not have been like carrying on secret propaganda against God? It would have amounted to this: "God desires that the present world order be replaced by his New Order; but, look here, you must not do anything about it. You must have an other-worldly hope and put your faith in heaven. That is how you can defeat God's designs of bringing His Kingdom on earth." Does this seem reasonable? And yet this is in effect what other-worldly constructions and expositions come to mean. Many ardent Christians, commended for their piety and evangelical fervour, have nevertheless spent their lives ardently promulgating just such a spurious interpretation. And it has borne undesirable fruit.

Let us turn to the succeeding verse. Jesus urges his hearers, "Keep your loins girt and your lamps lit and be like men who are waiting for their lord and master to return from a wedding banquet." Granting for the moment that Jesus was in an escapist mood, and had just previously admonished his audience to lay up treasures in "heaven," because on this wretched earth thieves break in and steal, would it not be wildly incoherent, then, for him to urge the same audience to keep themselves in constant readiness, to be ever on the qui vive for the arrival of their Lord and Master? Or did he mean that they should gird their loins and keep their lamps lit in the dim distant, romantic Hereafter? This is what he should logically have meant if he had used "heaven" to denote the Hereafter. Surely, Jesus was not in an escapist and a playful mood to confuse his eager, unsophisticated hearers many of whom hung on every word of his. He was not playing ducks and drakes with this paramount issue. He was appealing to his audience not to relax the morale of the New Order, here and now. He wanted them to keep themselves in readiness for the divine Commonwealth not in "heaven" but on this self-same earth which would become as good as heaven, being radically transformed.

The only reasonable view, therefore, which does justice to the sanity and consistency of Jesus, seems to be to take the verse we have been considering not by itself but in its context. It is of a piece with the other verses, deeply dyed in realism. "Heaven" implies "Kingdom of Heaven" upon earth; the projection into the structure of this world's systems of the divine plan for the community of man "Heaven" implies. This world full of evil and suffering and ugliness transformed by the motivating power of the divine Commonwealth into "heaven" where God's will is done en masse.

From this point of view, what did Jesus mean by saying "Get yourselves treasure in heaven that never fails, that no thief can get at and no month destroy, for where your treasure lies your heart will lie there also?"

This is perhaps the strongest direct appeal that Jesus made to men and women to invest their hopes and aspirations, their energy and time, their possessions and attainments in the divine Commonwealth for the common good. He tells them not to be afraid or nervous, because God has willed the Commonwealth for mankind by putting the principle of community into the very foundation of life, by making love, justice, and equality the structural principles of reality. He urges them to recognize their part in this great drama of realizing God's Plan, and to throw themselves heart and soul into playing their part well. And with a fine sense of humour he adds that the common purse does not wear out as purses of private ownership do; and that the dangers that beset the old order, the Kingdom of Mammon, have no power against man's investments in the true community.

If we hold dear the things that pertain to self, if the most precious things in the world for us are our position, wealth, fame, power, and gratification, we shall quite naturally strain every muscle to achieve our purpose. If our treasure lies in the scientific realm we shall invest our best in that realm and find our greatest happiness in working on scientific problems. If our treasure lies in the field of literature or art we shall spare ourselves no sacrifice, no effort, no expense to get our object. But if our treasure lies in the divine Commonwealth we shall spontaneously give our best time and energy, our all to the actualizing of this New Order for humanity. Our interests, our attention, our effort are enlisted by the persuasive force of our emotions. What we desire most we most work for. "Where your treasure lies, your heart will lie there also."

This is simple enough. But there are complications, simple and complex. A simple complication arises from the fact that our treasure lies in two or more conflicting realms. Naturally we are divided. Our interests, our attention, and our effort cannot fuse into a single flame. There are contradictions in our lives. And these contradictions are not antitheses held consciously at a point of tension impelling us to higher and larger syntheses. They are contradictions which sap our energy and make us weak-willed, wavering between the two realms in which our treasure is buried. There are many people, for example, who have part of their treasure in the realm of brotherhood and part of it in the realm of racialism. And it leads to a very fantastic contradiction. They are deeply interested in brotherhood which implies love; which in turn implies equality; which again implies liberty. They speak about brotherhood, and even work for it. But they are also deeply interested in their race. And the moment this brotherhood demands that they give up some racial convention, myth, or privilege, there is sudden conflict. And often racialism claims their heart. The few who have all their treasure in the realm of brotherhood serve to offer a telling contrast.

On the other hand, a complex complication arises because some of us have part of our treasure in "heaven" and the other part on "earth." We profess to hold dear the spiritual needs of people as well as their physical needs. We claim that we want individuals to have a change of heart and be saved and we also want society to be remade and redeemed. So far so good. But the vicious dualism that compells us to use conjunctions like "as well as" and "also" leads us astray the moment people claim economic justice, social equality, and political emancipation. The conflict that sets in expresses itself, in many instances, in a facile emphasis on the "spiritual," the "other-worldly" to the gradual exclusion of the "material." We escape from this contradiction by turning Jesus' Gospel of the Commonwealth into our Gospel of the Individual. We distract the attention of those who demand social and economic and political justice by drawing all kinds of red herrings across the path of their vision. We succeed in postponing the coming of the New Age; and pat ourselves on the back for serving the cause so ably, and incidentally in keeping safe and well-preserved.

Therefore, Jesus made such a strong unequivocal appeal to men and women to commit themselves unconditionally to the revolutionizing of the present order, which so often lays a premium on morality, and by riding rough-shod over human values destroys spiritual values. He wanted us to invest our all in the true community of man, the divine Commonwealth, in which men and women would find the brotherhood that is, and can be, the logical and moral derivative of the Fatherhood of God; in which men and women would find love the law of life, and therefore right relations the normal habit, in which war would become obsolete, and murderous competition would be outlawed; in which men and women would discover the indivisible wholeness and sanctity of life and know that the integrity of communion with God is determined by the integration of the community of man. But that way lies opposition, persecution, betrayal, and the Cross. That way also goes the Master still yearning for man's emancipation, still carrying the Cross we shirk to bear. Will we dare to follow him or choose the seductive bye-paths of compromise?

CULTURE OR CIVILISATION?

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Culture is a process by which the nature of the man, beast or vegetable kingdom is closely observed, watched, pruned, and perfected; or artificially fed, associated, trained, and developed in order to yield the greatest amount of the best in them with the least possible quantity or appearance of the undesirable therein; so much so that the product of culture, culti vation or education is so far removed from its original parent or kind that it is sometimes mistaken for a different species altogether being of a far higher order or grade. The brute in man is shaped into the very divine in him, even as the sour or bitter fruit of the original tree is changed into the most luscious or juicy one of the graft. If such culture should be found to exist in more than one field of human activity, it then constitutes what is so well known as civilisation. The very height of civilisation means and shows a very large number of such fields of activity, such as mental, moral, economic, and so on. And if the whole tribe or people happen to show the same advancement in all their several strata or levels of society, then civilisation is said to be assured and lasting.

But just as artificial ends have artificial means and aids, so, too, man's artificial growths and heights are attended with like dangers, deaths, decays and falls. If culture is not uniform or universal, then comes a stage when it is destroyed by the loop-holes of uncultured spots wherefrom the brute in man finds a way out and prays upon the best products of culture like vermin and pests in no time. The great devastating wars of the world are in point. They are but proofs of culture failures and ruins of civilisation. In other words, culture is not seen all round but only in parts; if man's brains have compelled Nature to yield unknown and unforeseen fruits of Science, Arts and Industry, his heart or character fails to rise equal to its full stature; and the result is that Man falls a victim to the creation of his own genius. And the worst fear is an utter annihilation of the whole human race from off the continent of Europe in the near future as it was so after the Maha Bharata War in Ancient India.

THE "DNYANODAYA'S" LAST WORD.

The Dnyanodaya writes:—

"The Indian Social Reformer has once more shown how regularly and promptly its respected editors read our columns. We have deeply appreciated this honour for years past, but we wish they would read them with carefulness and charity. For imagine our amazement at being charged in the latest Reformer with 'blatant smugness.' The Concise Oxford Dictionary defines 'smug' thus: 'Of commonplace, respectable, narrow-minded, self-satisfied, comfortable, unambitious, unimaginative character or appearance.' We presume the Reformer means we are 'self-satisfied.' As our columns for over two decades past have pointed out weaknesses in British Rule and in missionary work, we shall say nothing about the imported interpretations and illogical inferences of our Bombay friends."

We could not better the definition reprinted by the Dnyanodaya. We were commenting on its attitude on India's claim to Dominion Status not assessing its policy for the past two decades. On that the Dnyanodaya neither justifies its assertion nor produces the evidence which it claimed to possess.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANADLWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, t is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Between Right and Left :—Social problems, in which, of course, are included political, economic and all other problems which affect human life and conduct, are not amenable to what is called direct action. The link in them between cause and consequence is nearly always remote and indirect and it is often difficult to determine which is cause and which, effect. The only certain thing about them is that their solution always involves a change of heart and outlook in individuals; and this is a slow process. The method of "direct action" in politics, introduced some twenty years ago, has yielded no result ; except bringing some persons to power and fame. On the other hand, it has caused much confusion in society. If we were asked what the most urgent problem of today in India is, we should have no hesitation in answering, it is to get rid of the stranglehold of satyagraha. Every man, woman and child believes that his or her every whim is satya and that unless it is gratified they are justified in making a nuisance of themselves by setting out to starve unto death or by resorting to devices for compelling the pity of others, hitherto practised chiefly by sturdy mendicants. We are tempted to make these observations on reading that Mr. Subhas Bose was asked by his opponents at Wardha whether direct action was possible now with so many unsolved problems confronting the country. The answer, of course, is, it is not. But it never was because the problems which confront the country today, are not of yesterday's origin. They were all there when direct action was first adopted against the earnest counsel of experienced leaders, without a single exception that we can recall. The difference between Mr. Bose and his opponents is that, while they have learnt wisdom from experience, he still persists in the old belief in the efficacy of the direct method. Nothing has helped more to bring into relief the untoward consequences of direct action, which often means blind fanaticism, than the experience of responsibility by members of the so-called Right Wing. Mr. Bose rightly points out that the acceptance of office by the Congress has lured the minds of men away from direct, that is, empirical action. But is that a misfortune ?

Another Round Table Conference ? :—One thing must have become clear to Mr. Bose during the last fortnight. The people of India without distinction of caste or creed or political opinion, are distinctly averse to changing masters. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru who for all his perfervid declarations, is tied firmly to terra firma in the person of Gandhiji, realises that. The plea for an ultimatum, nevertheless, has been practically accepted though formally rejected by the Working Committee. This is evident from the announcement that Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Chairman of the War Committee, is waiting the reply of the British Government to the long statement issued by the Working Committee in order to define his future plan. We can readily anticipate the reply of the British Government. It will in effect be that His Majesty's Government has given serious consideration to the matters urged in the Working Committee's resolution. They indeed, have never for a moment been absent from their mind. But the Committee will, Government are sure, understand that at the present moment all things have to be subordinated to the supreme effort of winning the war in order to ensure the survival of democratic ideas and institutions. As soon as this urgent task is out of the way, the future constitutional position of India will have the first claim on Government's attention. A Conference of all parties, communities and interests will obviously be the best way of determining what its broad outlines should be. The Indian Princes also will be invited to advise. By this means, it is hoped, that a scheme satisfactory to all parties can be reached without unnecessary delay. What will be Pandit Jawaharlal's response to such an appeal ? What other reply can he expect in the present circumstances ?

Multitude of Council :—His Excellency the Viceroy is according interviews to Indian leaders of different parties, in connection with the War situation. In multitude of counsel there is safety. But safety is not all that has to be sought now. The crisis should be utilised to draw people together and closer to a cause which all have at heart. In this we doubt if Lord Linlithgow will find much help in a multitude of counsellors. The Muslim League leader would want something to which the Hindu Mahasabha leader would not agree. There is not much difference between the Congress and the Liberal Federation nowadays, what little there is being merely of terminology. Yet, Pandit Jawaharlal repudiates as fantastic the idea of an All Parties Conference. Evidently he wants all the glory for his own Party which has just elected him to guide its policy in regard to the War. Congress might refuse to come into an arrangement, such as the one we suggested last week, comprising leaders of all parties to be co-opted in the Governor-General's Cabinet. In that case and if the Congress is prepared to shoulder the burden itself, it should be invited to do so and the responsibility for taking the other groups with it or of dealing with them in other ways should be left to it. If the Muslim League wants to do the same, it should be taken at its word. If the two can be brought to work in coalition, so much the better. We must get a move on and not waste time in seeking to reconcile irreconcilables. Whichever party takes over the control, it will soon find that there is only one way of doing most of the things that it will be called upon to do. As the Government have given up the old practice of dealing with all citizens without reference to creed or caste, it is best to give the new policy a full trial. At present each party thinks that it can run the administration perfectly if it had a free hand. In the Provinces it is being found out that this is not so simple as it seemed when politicians enjoyed greater freedom and less responsibility. The same may happen at the Centre.

Lord Hailey's Broadcast :—On Tuesday Lord Hailey broadcast from London some observations on the situation in India with reference to the War. It was a tame performance containing nothing to stimulate interest in this country. It was Lord Hailey, as Home Member of the Government of India, who started the quibble about the Declaration of 1917 on constitutional reform, which, for the next ten years, kept the Indian public in a state of acute suspense and, incidentally, eliminated the Liberals as a political force. A very capable administrator, Lord Hailey was concerned only to get through his daily task expeditiously without regard to consequences. If, as he remarked, Congress has hesitated to pledge itself to give unconditional support on this occasion, it is largely due to the clever way in which Lord Hailey threw doubt on what was subsequently acknowledged to be the plain implication of the Declaration. Two years ago the Right Hon. Srinivasa Sastry incurred much odium in official circles by forewarning them of the consequence of a policy of vacillating drift.

Gandhiji and the War:—Lord Hailey in the course of his broadcast observed: "Mr. Gandhi despite his horror of war, has expressed unconcealed belief in the justice of Britain's cause and is urging that any support giv... Britain should be given unconditionally." ... always risky to cite anything that Gandhiji ... as he has his own meaning which may not ... with that commonly given to words. ... present case is no exception. If Lord H... had read the explanation given in the Harij... Gandhiji to a correspondent, he would not ... so readily assumed that Gandhiji believes ... justice of a cause. Gandhiji writes:

I do not judge his clai... is highly probable that his right to incorporate D... in Germany is beyond question, if the Danzig Ge... desire to give up their independent status. Was Poland, ... other party, willing to accept arbitrati... Evidently not. The fact is that what L... Hailey understands by "the British cause" is ... the same as what Gandhiji regards as the c... of the War.

The "Dnyanodaya" on Dominion Status:—S... ing the opportunity afforded by a statem... on the War which asked Britain for ... assurance that the ultimate goal for India ... Dominion Status, the Dnyanodaya tells Ind... why we have not yet got this declaration:—

> Despite the assurance of Britain that Indian ... government is still the goal laid down by Britain, ... time for reaching that goal is being delayed by the ... members of the Commonwealth family—Ca... Australia etc—because self-government as it works ... India is gravely marred by such things as ... untouchability, wrongs to outcastes, to women and ... children. British throne was suggested by the Dominions. The Dnyanodaya is perhaps well-intentioned in its ill-timed admonition to Indians to reform themselves but its remarks naturally lead one to ask whether such people as it depicts are good enough for the War in Europe. Or are we to conclude that the British Empire does not disdain to engage the barbarous Indians in their dirty work? We believe that Indians have suffered enough at the hands of the Dominions already without the addition of this fresh insult. The moment the Dominions, many of whom will not tolerate Indians on their territory or will only do so under humiliating conditions, start telling Britain what our status is to be, it will be time for us to cut loose from the Empire. It will be for Britain to decide whether the Dominions, all of whom are careful in this present crisis not to commit themselves to the despatch of troops abroad, are more valuable to her Empire, or whether India which is prepared to help without stint, if she is allowed to do so, will be a better bulwark. At all times the foreign missionary has sought to advance his religion as he understands it, by running down others. But at no time is it more misplaced than today when Europe has been brought to the verge of annihilation by the bankruptcy of its leaders, religious even more than political.

The British Premier :— In the whole range of history it will be hard to find a statesman possessed with a higher degree of smug self-complacency than the British Premier. In the first statement after the declaration of war with Germany, he declared that all his hopes, ambitions and aspirations as a politician had crumbled to the ground. A very large body of opinion in Britain regards his bungling as being at the bottom of the present chaotic condition of Europe. A writer in the Spectator contrasts Mr. Chamberlain's statement barely a year ago with the one which he made the other day. At the time of the Czecho-Slovakian crisis, he exclaimed : " How horrible, fantastic, incredible it is that we should be digging trenches and trying on gas-masks here because of a quarrel in a faraway country between people of whom we know nothing." He now he avers ; " We shall not be fighting for the political future of a far away city in a foreign land. We shall be fighting for the preservation of those principles the destruction of which would involve the destruction of peace and liberty of the peoples of the world." Britain and France have now undertaken to restore Czecho-Slovakia as an independent State which they a year ago assisted in reducing to impotence. Mr. Neville Chamberlain suffers under two handicaps in taking a dispassionate view of the situation as the Prime Minister of the British Empire should, of the war situation. He has a sort of personal grievance at having been duped by Herr Hitler by promises which have not been kept. He is also embarrassed by the feeling that many of his own supporters fear that he may be still have hankerings after his appeasement policy which has borne disastrous fruit. Under the stress of the two sentiments, he may be adopting an extreme line which may exceed the necessities of the case considered both as a moral and as an international issue, and more particularly in relation to the varied conditions, moral and material, comprised in the British Empire.

Khaksars in Action :—Some days back a contingent of Khaksars headed by their leader, Allama Inayutullah Mashriqi, encamped at Lucknow, their object being to settle the Sunni-Shia dispute in that city, which had been going on for several months. Their arrival seems to have aggravated the situation. They were arrested. Before their trial came up before a Magistrate, the Allama, according to the National Herald, gave an undertaking to Government to leave the United Provinces with his followers and not to enter it for a year. Instructions were be given to the Khaksars of the United Provinces not to interfere in the Sunni-Shia dispute. Government accepted the undertaking and withdrew the prosecution. The National Herald reported on September 3 that all the Khaksars who 'invaded" Lucknow were allowed to go away in batches leaving their spades behind with the police as mementos of their visit. The Khaksars, however, have not kept their undertaking. Further incursions by groups of them are reported in the Press. The surprising announcement has been made this week that Dr. Ziauddin Ahmed, Vice-Chancellor of Alighar University, has applied to the Allama to nominate him as provincial head of the organization in the United Provinces.

Dr. Deshmukh's Divorce Bill :—At the Simla session of the Indian Legislative Assembly, the Bill to introduce divorce in the Hindu law of marriage, which Dr. G. V. Deshmukh had introduced at the Delhi session, was thrown out on the motion to refer it to Select Committee. The sponsor was not present to defend his measure, in deference to a mandate of the Congress. It is possible that the Bill would have met the same fate even if the Doctor was present. Mrs. Subbarayan has been recently publicly opposing the measure. She also belongs to the Congress party and was absent from the Assembly. Dr. Deshmukh has since issued a statement exhorting reformers not to be discouraged. But reformers who really care for the reforms which they advocate, will now seek support from quarters which are not inclined to make a convenience of social reform.

Marriage by Proxy :—On of the social customs common in India among certain communities marriage by proxy. The passing of a law this week by the French Parliament permitting soldiers in the field to marry by proxy, shows that there is nothing primitive about the custom and that it must have been dictated, as all customs have originally been, by a practical necessity. Several countries in Europe have now laws for the adoption of children.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, September 23, 1939.

THE TRAGEDY OF POLAND.

The conclusion of a "non-aggression pact" between Germany and Russia was announced on August 28. On September the first, German troops invaded Poland. On the third, Great Britain and France declared war on Germany. Japan had promptly declared her disapproval of the Russo-German Pact and declined to accept the German plea that it did not infringe the anti-Comintern Pact. But Germany seems to have persevered in her effort to bring about an understanding between Russia and Japan. The conclusion of an Armistice between the two Powers on the Manchukuo-Mongolian border was made public on September 16 and on the next day Russia invaded Poland. In the last fortnight, Germany has occupied Danzig and laid siege to Warsaw. The Soviet Prime Minister, M. Molotov, explained that the breakdown of the Polish State had necessitated the intervention of the Soviet Government to protect the White Russians and Ukranians who had been deprived of all rights by the Polish Government. The Polish Government had removed itself to Rumania. On Monday the 18th, the German and Russian leaders met at Brest Litovsk in the territory of Poland and issued a joint manifesto to the effect that their interests did not conflict though they were acting quite independently of each other. It is stated that the two Powers have agreed that Germany should take Danzig, the Corridor and Upper Silesia which were in the German Empire before the War, that Russia would take parts of Ukraine and White Russia which were assigned to Poland in the Peace Treaty, and that the rest of the present Polish territory will be constituted into a buffer State between the two Powers. The position would be exactly similar to that of Czecho-Slovakia after the separation of Sudetenland and the buffer State will eventually have to come under the protection of either Russia or Germany. As acompletely independent State it could not long maintain itself. It will be, to use the phrase of Lord Lytton of Afghanistan in the early eighties of the last century when Russia was a Central Asian power, an earthern pipkin between two iron pots.

The conclusion of a Pact between Herr Hitler and Soviet Russia shows that the former has gone back on his denunciations of Communism and that M. Stalin was secretly negotiating with Germany at the same time as he was negotiating with Britain. The antithesis between Nazism and Socialism is not more marked than that between Capitalism and Bolshevism. In fact, Nazism stands midway between Capitalism and Bolshevism and, therefore, nearer to it than Capitalism. As for M. Molotov's double-dealing, he on his part has charged Great Britain with not being sincere in the negotiat[ions] with the Soviet Government. The role of "h[onest] broker" in international affairs has been co[n]crated by distinguished precedents. The Econ[o]mist which denounces the conduct of the Sov[iet] Government as the blackest treachery in histo[ry] concludes a leading article headed "Dou[bt]ful Cross Roads" with the bitter reflection "th[at] Britain should be faced with such a hea[vy] struggle (as that entailed by the Pact) is [a] shameful burden placed by the bankruptcy [of] statesmanship on the shoulders of the people." It adds :

> Over and over again we have been given [the] chance of stopping the rot at infinitely smaller ri[sk]. But we have let the League of Nations die, and even [its] bastard offspring the Peace Front is barely alive. [The] bravery and endurance of the common people will [no]w have to pay heavily for the utter lack of courage a[nd] foresight in those who have held the high offices [of] state during the past eight years.

The New Statesman and Leader, which take a more sympathetic view of the action of the Soviet Government, holding that it is the res[ult] of the rebuffs with which Soviet overtures [for] co-operation with the Western democracies ha[ve] been met, also blames the folly of the Chamberlian Government in persisting in [the] wrong policy in the face of clear warnings fro[m] many quarters.

Bolshevism today is not the same a[s] it was ten years ago. The article which we reprinted two weeks ago from the Spectator on "Family Life in Russia" by Mrs. Cecil Chesterton, shows that the Soviet outlook has undergone fundamental change under M. Stalin. Even in this very episode [we] discern a notable change in the Bolshevik ideology. The old slogan "Proletarians of the World Unite" has given place to the Nazi idea of ethnic nationalism. M. Molotov's reason for invading Poland is to rescue minorities of the Russian race, Ukranians and White Russians, from oppression. White Russians, by the way, are so-called not because they are whiter than the other two branches, the Great and Little Russians also known as Ukranians, but because they have a partiality for white clothing. The Soviet army's march into Polish White Russia and Ukraine has been almost a walk-over. By the middle of the week it had occupied nearly the whole of the territory inhabited by people of the Russian race speaking Russian dialects and professing the orthodox Greek religion. (The Ruthenians or Ukrainians are Uniats who acknowledge the authority of the Roman Pontiff but follow the Greek ritual of worship. The Poles on the other hand, are strict Catholics.) Nazism, too, may shed many of its most obnoxious features notably, its fanatical anti-Semitism. But as the outlook is we need not despair of finding a ray of light in it to relieve mankind from utter despair.

Powerless as we in India are to influence the course of events in this horrible conflict, we can only trust that the better and more rational and humane elements in the countries immediately concerned, will be not long in asserting themselves and bringing about a Peace which will commend itself to the judgment of history as just and righteous. It was said of the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava, that it was magnificent but not war. The Polish defence of Warsaw against overwhelming superiority of numbers and equipment and with the certainty that it must fail, merits a similar tribute. It is heroic. But it is rather mass suicide than war in which the belligerents on both sides are matched not too unequally. Dr. Schuschnigg, when the Nazi army entered Austria, announced that resistance would mean useless slaughter and bloodshed and that he would not, therefore, fight the invaders. Similarly in Czechoslovakia, Dr. Benes held back his well-trained army from resisting the German occupation of Sudetenland. Mr. Chamberlain in his statement in the House of Commons on Wednesday acknowledged that they could not avert the defeat of Poland but that Britain and France would not rest until Poland had won back her freedom. Probably the end of the week will see the fall of Warsaw. Once again will history have to mourn, "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell."

INDIA AND THE WAR.

The past fortnight has been rich in declarations from Indian politicians and parties relating to the War in Europe. Special importance attaches to the resolutions of four leading political all-India organisations—the Indian National Congress, the National Liberal Federation, the Hindu Mahasabha and the Muslim League. The Independent Labour Party of Bombay and the Democratic Swaraj Party have also declared their attitude. The common points of their various policies are more significant than their differences. The first of these is the fact, surprising so far as the Congress and the Muslim League are concerned, that not one of them contemplates an India without the British. So far are they from making capital out of Britain's difficulties, as it was feared, that to most of them the question was how to co-operate with the Government without seeming to go back on past commitments. Independence, freedom and the fight against British imperialism, were all so many catch-words now thrown aside. The principal consideration in all men's minds has been that the present Government of India is preferable to Nazi rule in any case and it has had no small part in determining the attitude of political leaders. It is well to face that fact squarely. Anti-Nazism has been Britain's best friend in this crisis in India. As it is not possible for politicians who have stumped the country in the cause of Indian independence frankly to avow this, the resolutions reach the same conclusion through devious ways.

The best of these is the Congress Working Committee's statement which was published on September 15. Gandhiji has since revealed that it was drafted by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. In it India's attitude to the War is considered from the broadest point of view. The Working Committee seeks a clear statement from Britain of her war aims in regard to democracy and imperialism and "the new order that is envisaged;" and as to how these aims are going to apply to India and to be given effect to in the present. In brief the attitude of the Working Committee seems to be one of eagerness to fight the Nazis, provided the British Government is prepared to fight imperialism on all fronts. The indictment of British policy in Manchukuo, in Abyssinia, in Czechoslovakia and in Spain conveys the feeling that the Congress Working Committee requires reasons before it can believe or ask the country to believe that the independence of Poland is more essential to world democracy than was the independence of these other countries; and some proof that Britain had undergone a change of heart and was now prepared to fight Fascism all over the world. The first of these cannot be maintained. It remains to be seen whether Mr. Chamberlain is prepared to concede to the Indian National Congress what deterred him from an understanding with M. Stalin and the Soviet State. It is more likely that Britain in the midst of her "War to end Hitlerism," already in danger of being mixed up with Russia in a war to end Stalinism, will be thankful to keep herself free from other entanglements in China and in the Mediterranean. The Congress, we may take it, will not insist on this rather far reaching demand. The Congress statement raises immediately the issue of the moral justification of the present War. It must be proved to be a disinterested one so far as Britain is concerned. It must also be shown to be a good thing for India, both immediately and in the future. Both these can be easily done—particularly now that the Congress itself is anxious to be convinced.

The National Liberal Federation asks the country to give ungrudging and unconditional support to Britain, restates its faith in democratic principles and declares its repugnance to Nazism and Fascism. At the same time, it asks the British Government to create psychological conditions in India which may lead to general political appeasement and render the fullest co-operation possible. As measures in this direction, it suggests the replacement of the present Central Government by a responsible one and the creation of a modern and efficient Indian Defence force to enable India to defend herself. The Hindu Mahasabha makes much the same suggestions and in addition recommends changes in the Communal Award particularly in Bengal and the Punjab. It concludes with a warning to the Viceroy not to regard the Congress as representative of Hindu opinion. The Mahasabha statement contains such suggestions of detail on the Indianization of the army as the removal of the distinction between martial and non-martial races, the expansion of the Territorial Force and the University Training Corps, and the encouragement of arms and motor manufactures in India. The Democratic Swaraj Party in its resolution declares its sympathy with Britain and regrets that India, because of her economic and political condition and on account of the total disarmament now existing here, cannot give effective expression to that sympathy. The Independent Labour Party seeks a declaration that the ultimate political status of India will be Dominion Status and the throwing open of the Army to all Indians. In a lengthy statement it urges that only a clear declaration of the terms of the peace which must follow this War and an assurance that India will be consulted on questions of foreign policy, can create public enthusiasm for India's entry into it. It writes:

> India has a greater claim to participate in the foreign policy of the British Empire and in the making of the peace terms than any Dominion. The Dominions have the right to be neutral. Consequently they are not bound to undergo the consequences of a war resulting from a particular foreign policy if they do not approve of the justness or propriety of the war. But India has no escape from any war which the British Cabinet chooses to involve themselves in. If India is to be committed to war or peace then she has an absolute right to be consulted, which sadly is not the case to-day.

The Muslim League has drawn up an indictment against the Congress and has in effect told the British Government that, unless the Governors of Indian Provinces are directed to intervene more energetically and more frequently in the interests of the Muslim minorities, Muslim cooperation cannot be real and full. It also asks that no constitution for India should be framed without consulting the Muslim League. The attack on the Congress reads like a Nazi broadcast against the treatment of German minorities in enemy countries: "in the Congress-governed provinces today the liberty, person, property and honour of Mussulmans are in danger and even their elementary rights are trampled upon most callously." The League further states that this country is composed of "various nationalities and does not constitute a National State." The Muslim community is in a peculiar position in British India. Whilst it is advised by its biggest political party to keep back co-operation until the League demands are satisfied, it is the one community to which appeals have been addressed by Muslim rulers of Indian States to cooperate unconditionally. Most of the Indian Princes have been content to offer their services and the resources of their State—not as the Congress statement thinks for the preservation of democracy in Europe but out of loyalty to the King-Emperor. One or two have appealed to British India to do the same. But all the Muslim rulers, in whose States by the way there are a majority of Hindu subjects, have appealed specially to the Muslims of India for full cooperation. Of the many attitudes adopted by the various parties in the country, that of the Muslim League seems to be the most difficult to reconcile with the others.

A WAR-TIME REFLECTION.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

One of the worst features of war-time is that, along with so many other restrictions imposed on individual liberty, one's right of independent thinking and of freely expressing thoughts is also seriously curtailed if not directly or indirectly taken away. Indirectly because, though free expression of thoughts and opinions may not be actually forbidden, the strict notice likely to be taken of them by the Government of a belligerent country, if the opinions be in any way critical of the Government or of the Government's policy, effectively stops freedom of thought and expression. In a country under the political dominance of a warring country matters are naturally much worse, because people in a dependency are without many of the civil liberties enjoyed by people of an independent country. The people of such a country feel the difficulties more keenly, as their interest in the war being remote and a mere incidence of dependency, they cannot remain as absorbed and engaged in matters concerned with the war as the people of the fighting countries. But for all the bitterness coming through such mental strangulation, the people of dependent countries must thank themselves for their state of dependency is only the result of their own past lapses and misdeeds and present effortlessness.

A most unhappy consequence, however, of such restrictions is that much of the thought contribution on current topics, particularly political and economic, which thoughtful and far-seeing people of the time could and would have made, is lost, though such contribution might well have helped towards their solution and correct appraisement. In the absence of such deep thinking and unbiased exposition, the questions of the hour not only go unjudged and unappreciated but are vitiated by false colouration and misrepresentation indulged in by people, who either lack discernment and correct judgment, or under stress of circumstances feel compelled to write to the tune of the reigning government's propagandists. That is another incidence of dependency and an unavoidable consequence of war conditions to write thus against one's conscience and better judgment and even against one's cherished and avowed principles—many would perhaps say; but thereby they would not give any solace to free-thinkers and lovers of truth, who bemoan the sudden disappearance of straight-forwardness and honest view-points from the public press. Not only does this disappearance become plain and obvious in newspapers and periodicals, but there also appear often wilful and studied distortion and misrepresentation transfused into editorial comments and writings. Why that should be done is, however, not clear. The editors and conductors of papers may feel the pinch of censorship and of implied restrictions on freedom of expression, but for that reason there can be no explanation for their going out of their way to say and write what they do not believe in,—unless of course it be with a desire to enter their names in the good books of the State authorities. Those who adore the principle of observing truth and discarding injustice and untruth more than what may come from the approving smile of the powers that be, can well put off their political editorials till war clouds have cleared and normality of conditions has returned. And, if they feel their fingures itching for the pen they might better take up non-political themes and discourse on, for instance, social and moral philosophy. In that way they will be doing far more good to themselves and to the public than by dishing to them every morning or every week writings underlined by propagandist motive. Ordinarily they do not get much time, nor, perhaps do they feel inclined, for thoughtful study and deep undisturbed contemplation by themselves on issues and problems ultimately affecting human affairs. They should better utilise their precious leisure during war-time in such useful pursuit and in writing out for public benefit the product of their study and deliberation. The reading public after going through the news columns may turn or not to those thoughtful writings, but those of them who do so will be benefitted, and will no doubt be spared the suffering of reading literature inspired by timid mentality and by thoughts fixed on merely pleasing the country's government.

From that point of view a war can even be taken as not an unmitigated evil, for it gives forced scope and leisure for philosophical reflections over and penetrating analysis of non-political matters of great human significance, which busy journalists and leader-writers neglect, during the pre-occupations of peace time. Such occasional analysis and reflection from a high plane enrich journalism, do good to one's soul, heighten wisdom and clarify vision.

RELIGION AND WAR.

(By Paul Santamurti, Lucknow).

All nations profess to believe in God as the father of mankind. They either believe or do not believe. It cannot be both ways. They cannot for any length of time make people believe that they believe and yet act as if they did not. That method of doing things may be paying for a while, but, in the long run, it will collapse. A war or even a rumour of war will upset all systems and calculations built on pseudo-belief. If we say that we believe, what is the nature of our belief about our God? Do we believe that we have a bargaining god whose favours might be gained or whose anger might be averted by gifts, offerings, sacrifices, praises, prayers and cajoling? Or do we believe that we have for God a loving father who is as holy, just and righteous as he is loving and merciful? Do we believe that we could go on living as we would and expect God, holy and righteous, to draw our chestnuts for us out of the fire, simply because we pray to him, to do this or do that? If we neglect righteousness, mercy and love, the fundamental basis of all true faith, how can we expect God to heed our prayers merely because we stick to the official forms of prayers? What are all our fasts and prayers worth if they ignore, at bottom, truth, justice, fair play and love?

If we honestly believe that we want peace we must, first and foremost of all, eradicate all the causes of war, even if need be, through a thorough surgical operation, pain and suffering though such a process might entail. To plant a tree, that will bring forth bitter and poisonous fruit, and then, when the tree begins to bring forth, to stand up and pray to God, that its fruits should turn out to be sweet and life-giving, is to insult the person whom we pray to.

War is not God-made. It is the direct result of our having strayed away, from His Laws, from His Home and from His Love. The desire to get rich, to amass wealth, to accumulate capital, to hoard is the chief cause of all troubles. "The love of money is the root of all kinds of evil which, some reaching after, have been led astray from faith," says Saint Paul.

Accumulated capital or money-capital, is a dead thing unless it is allowed to multiply. So if it has to live, it must produce profit, dividends, rent, interest, or whatever name one chooses to call it by. If wealth is not to dwindle away, if it is not to disappear it must be productive and produce more wealth. Where accumulation stops, waste or deterioration sets in. Thus, in order to save capital from ruin, we have to resort to the exploitation of workers, by means of over-work, lower wages and various other kinds of man's inhumanity to man. It is only then, that dividends and profits will come. The lower the wages, the greater the profits, is the law of capitalist economics but low wages bring down the purchasing power of the people and that means less sales. When sales go down, production has to be restricted and restricted production leads to unemployment, higher prices and less consumption. Lowering of the standards of living, which is the result of unemployment and less consumption, leads to the destruction of the home markets. Nations have, then, to go in search of foreign markets, where they are sure to be greeted by the complications of international competition and tariff laws. The next step for each nation is, to secure colonies, dependencies of its own and erect tariff walls to safeguard its own interests and export capital. This breeds fear, distrust, desire for security, Armaments races, Imperialism, Fascism and War. Individually and collectively, we want to hold fast to our private rights of property in productive capital. In order that the capital may grow more and more and not diminish we want to earn profits and more profits.

It may be retorted that all capitalists and monied men are not wicked and that there are many, who are generous, kind, noble, charitable and even philanthropic and so on. Yes, there are many such people, and we thank God, that they are there, in spite of all the inhuman tendencies of a god-denying, man-ignoring and profit-hunting social order. But even if all the capitalists of the world were equally generous and philanthropic, the net result of the vicious system will not be anything different from what it will be, if all of them were wicked.

Be the individual capitalists however noble or enlightened, it will not make the slightest difference, and war will be, the inevitable and inescapable consequence of a social and economic order, based upon the private ownership of productive capital and whose chief driving force is the profit motive. Let us, for argument's sake, concede that a few manufacturers pay their workmen far higher wages than the rest. What will happen? First and foremost of all they will be driven out of the field, either by competition, or a by bankruptcy court, or by both combined. They will be soon standing, beside their erstwhile employees, or will be on the streets, in search of work or in the poor-house. Even if they escaped all these humiliations, the result upon society, will not be different. Their higher wages might raise the purchasing power of their workmen, for a time, which will mean more sales, more employment, more consumption, higher standards of life, and more production. All these will only be a day's wonder, because, increased production will immediately bring the prices down and the old process of low prices, less profits, reduction of wages, low purchasing power, less sales, restricted production, unemployment, less consumption, high prices, lower standards of living, destruction of the home markets, search for colonies and dependencies, tariff walls, export of capital, anxiety for security, Imperialism, Fascism, Armament races and War, have to be gone through, again and again, in a vicious circle, out of which there will never be even a hope of escape. So, wars have deeper causes than the temporary insanity of individual dictators, and as long as the causes of war are not removed, root and branch, it will be futile to pray for peace.

Whoever might be responsible for war, God does not want it, and when anything that seems, for a time, to run counter to His will, happens, He is able to make that evil, which threatens the good, to subserve his plans of ultimate goodness for the world. So let us pray that along with the toll of human lives and carnage and bloodshed that this war might take out of the world, it might also take away all the causes of war and that, out of this war might come, a New Social Order, a New civilization with a lasting peace based on obedience to God's laws of Love and Brotherhood.

INDEPENDENCE AND EMPIRE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It was very chivalrous of Mahatma Gandhi to have assured the world that at the present European crisis, which of course affects India also, he is not anxious even about the "deliverance" of his country; for what will that deliverance be worth if Britain and France are defeated or if Germany is humbled? So the deliverance of our country, the sacred cause of our freedom, is virtually a secondary matter. We are to be interested in this matter only in times of European peace. We are to talk about it, and perhaps act, when Britain and France are safe and Germany is not humbled.

It raises not only a grave political issue, but a moral issue of the first magnitude. Can a nationalist, without loss of integrity, relax his interest in the cause of Indian freedom, no matter what the world situation may be? His first loyalty is to the cause of national well-being, and if that well-being demands political emancipation, he must be prepared at all times, under any conditions, to struggle for freedom. It is the first duty of the Indian nationalist, regardless of his party or creed, to fight for and safeguard the honour and betterment and freedom of his country. And this moral duty cannot be regulated by the state of affairs in Europe or any other part of the world. Surely, reason does not sanction selling the interests of the country on credit, for a remotely possible measure of responsible self-government to be doled out by Great Britain under insulting protests from Churchill and his kind.

Few of us are so blind as not to see that our country must be dragged into any war which Britain chooses to enter. But are we going to welcome the coercion? Are we not going to register protests against such domination? Just because Britain decides she must declare war, so as to maintain the balance of power and protect herself and her imperialist interests, is it morally imperative or logically necessary for India to give up her struggle for her own independence and democracy, and run with her gold and her men into the whirlpool of imperialism to help those who hold her as a subject country?

There is certainly no question about India's sympathy being on the side of democracy as against all forms of Nazism with its inhuman race-feelings and race-animosities. In the event of the democracies being threatened there should be no question of India's alliance with the democracies, but only if she attains to the status of an independent democracy and can enter such an alliance on terms of absolute equality and liberty. That is why it becomes so urgently incumbent on Indian nationalists and Indian leaders to do their utmost so that India might find her place among the democratic and self-governing nations as early as possible. Only when India can join the struggle as an equal partner will there be any honour and significance in her joining. If India were an independent democratic state, as she aspires to be, there is no question of her active sympathy with Poland. But such help can only be given by India not by British India. As it is, we can only wish Poland well and watch her brave defence with admiration, for India itself is in a worse condition than Poland.

With our passion for freedom, justice and democracy have we forgotten within 20 years the aftermath of the last war? Calcutta and Bombay used to have a race in war gifts not to speak of the hundreds of other sources of huge donations. Our Gurkha and Pathan and Sikh troops fought with celebrated bravery. We can not again pin our faith to the chances of future courtesies and benefactions. We dare not forget our first and solemn duty of keeping up the struggle for Indian independence, and of continuing with might and main to keep the nation prepared for non-violent action.

The present crisis, portending chaos and suffering and destruction, must spur Indian nationalists to strive for unity and solidarity. The only unity worth the name can be achieved on the basis of utter frankness, mutual good will, and political singleness of purpose. Somehow, our leaders must bring this about. Between all political parties, communal groups, ideological factions, between Rightists and Leftists, the High Command and the Forward Bloc, radicals and conservatives, between the various communities, somehow there must be brought about complete mutual understanding, trust, and willingness for concerted action. Any suspicions about political aims and objectives, any doubts about bonafides, any misgivings about a clash of personal and public interests and about the willingness to push forward and make sacrifices must be removed by deliberate effort. This is assuredly not the time to stand on ceremony. Waiving aside false pride and puerile feelings of personal prestige, all sections in India should be rallied together by the call of nationalism, welded together by the single drive of national service.

Such a lead will be more conducive than anything else to the infusing of fresh energy, hope and faith in the rank and file of the people. We cannot afford to let the faith of the masses in the struggle for independence waver at this juncture. We cannot afford to let youth feel discouraged or driven to desperation by a feeling of indefinite postponement. We cannot afford to give the impression that any section of Indian nationalists are losing their revolutionary spirit and enthusiasm. I remember when I visited some of the Congress Ministers of the Central Provinces a few days after the Ministry was formed in 1937, how heartening it was to hear their remark, "We know we don't belong here. We are birds of passage. We belong to the streets, the shish, the struggle, and are ready to go back to it all." This spirit must become contagious and touch the lives and hearts of youth and the masses. The gallant spirit of 1921, and the succeeding decade must again, and on a nation-wide scale, become the inspiration of India. With the passion of an inner conviction, with the whole-heartedness of complete understanding and goodwill, India must be prepared to act as one man for the national cause.

As the present war crisis assumes more and more menacing proportions, somehow our leaders must devise means of inculcating upon our people, the masses, the students, the bourgeoise, congressmen, and non-congressmen, the desperate need for individual and collective integrity, for individual and collective stamina, for individual and collective realism. It is only that at times of crisis obvious things are forgotten, and there is a feverish tendency to put first things second, that some of these things have to be said. The Indian struggle demands absolute integrity on the part of every individual citizen, and on the part of collective groups of citizens, whatever their insignia and labels. Without that no national struggle can be kept up; and even if it is sustained it can do nothing for the advancement and permanent good of the nation. The Indian struggle demands unshrinking courage from every individual Indian citizen and groups of citizens, because unless we have a tenacity of purpose, a quality of grim constancy under the worst conditions, we will hardly prove worthy of the freedom we seek. And the Indian cause demands sheer realism on the part of individual citizens and political and communal groups, since we know the sad results of sentimental or romantic patriotism. Liberty is an ideal to be sure, but we are out to complete and realize that ideal in action. We must be realists to see that it is in practice we must obtain and confer the liberty, equality and fraternity that we have sought and shall seek to the end. The romantic idealism that has coloured some of our nationalism in the past, and still colours the thought and inconsistencies of certain sections today, must be purged. And in its place we must develop a sturdy political realism that is determined to span the gulf between theory and practice, platform oratory and actual conduct, ideals and action.

The European crisis, therefore, should awaken us to take stock of our nationalism and to strive to put into it what it lacks. It should bring us closer together to face facts unitedly and realistically, so that we might be aware of our first duties, our first loyalties, the first demands on our lives, energies, and activities. The Indian nationalist demands justice for his country and the right, the inalienable right, of 360 million human beings to manage their own affairs and do their best for the economic, social, and political advancement of the country. The Indian nationalist protests against foreign domination and economic exploitation. And, therefore, it is his solemn obligation not to rest until his country has achieved freedom and justice and is capable of shaping its foreign policy as an honourable equal in the commonwealth of nations. We have nothing against Britain. But we do not, and, as self-respecting people who love liberty and democracy as deeply as the British or the French, we cannot, submit to the humiliating position of a subject people and be dragged into war as chattel. Thus, although we wish with all our hearts that the free democracies may be safe and triumphant, we wish it because we ardently desire that our nation should attain to the position of a free democracy as soon as ever it can. It must never be Fascism and Nazism; she is equally opposed to Imperialism; for all are species of the generic evil of domination. And domination is a denial alike of freedom and democracy.

Yours etc.,
CYRIL MODAK.

"INDIA AND THE WAR."

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have always enjoyed your trenchant observations on public affairs and your flair for nailing to the counter the none too infrequent fallacies and instances of potted thinking that lurk in the utterances of our public men. Your latest leader on "India and the War" was no exception. Amidst the din and dust of the propaganda that is seething around us at the moment, it is refreshing to turn to your clear-headed views on India and the war. When in the name of international liberty and justice, appeals are made to us to throw our entire resources in men, money and munitions unconditionally at the service of Great Britain, is it 'exploiting England's difficulty' (with the implied moral stigma) to question how the selfsame principles are faring with respect to India?

Sangli,
13th September, 1939.

Yours etc.,
V. R. KULKARNI.

HITLER'S WORLD REVOLUTION*

The Russo-German agreement does not come as a complete surprise to those who have studied closely the ideals which have been shaping the policy of Nazi leaders. These ideas have little to do with the official "ideology" of the Nazi programme, the rantings against "Bolshevic subhumanity" or the romantic vision of a trek of German colonists on the medieval model to win a new "Lebensraum" in the Ukraine. They are hard and realistic and to a considerable extent they have been stolen from the intellectual arsenal of British Imperialism.

In 1904 one of the leading spirits of British Imperialism, Sir Halford Mackinder, then professor of geography at Oxford set out for the first time, in a lecture to the Royal Geographical Society, his startling doctrine of "the pivot of history." The "pivot of history" was in his opinion "the heartland of the Old World," in the other words the great plain stretching from the mouth of the Elbe to the mouth of the Amur, the cradle of those barbarous hordes which, like the Huns and later the Mongols, had poured out from here to subdue the countries on its fringes, Western and Southern Europe, India and China. Against this "heartland," the centre of "land power," there stood the representatives of the other fringe, the Sea Powers—Great Britain, the United States and Japan. On this theory history, in the last resort, revealed itself as the struggle between the land power of the "heartland" and the Sea Powers for the control of the inner semicircle.

The idea Sir Halford later expanded and applied to the practical problem of the reorganisation of the world after the Great War. In a book, bearing the significant title, Democratic Ideas and Realities, published in 1919 while the Peace Conference was deliberating at Versailles, he urged the vital necessity of preventing Germany and Russia from joining forces. These two Powers were able by the control of the heartland to dominate not only the Old World but the world as a whole. They had lost the war because they had been fighting on opposite sides, but by that common loss they might well learn their lesson and unite. Sir Halford was not satisfied with the "Sanitary Cordon of buffer states" created at Versailles, but advanced an infinitely more daring and ambitious project, the exchange of the German population of East Prussia with the Polish population of West Prussia, the later Corridor. This proposal had the incidental advantage that it avoided the irritations caused by the Corridor, but its main objective was to destroy the bridge between the Soviet Union and Germany afforded by the continued existence of East Prussia.

These ideas of Sir Halford Mackinder might have remained completely unnoticed in Germany if it had not been for a man who later became the dominant influence in Nazi policy. General Haushofer, the creator of "geopolitics," was an officer on the Bavarian General Staff, and from 1908 onwards was attached for several years to the Japanese Army. As a result of his observations, which went far beyond the immediate military sphere, he published on his return in 1912 a sensational book, Dai Nippon (Greater Japan) urging an alliance with Japan and beyond that the creation of a great transcontinental block consisting of Germany, Russia and Japan, to oppose the two Anglo-Saxon Powers. Having risen during the war to the post of a divisional commander, he took up after Versailles a professorship of geography at Munich, with the intention of developing that science into a weapon for the resurrection of German World Power.

It was Haushofer who seized upon Sir Halford's book in one of the first issues of the Zeitschrift fur Geopolitik and recommended it as an extremely valuable medicine, which should not be refused merely because it was concocted by the enemy. Adding to it ideas he had gathered in the East, he developed the apocalyptic vision of a world-wide rising of the coloured nations of the East against the capitalistic rule of the Western Democracies, sponsored and led by the Soviet Union and by Germany.

These ideas, propounded by him the Zeitschrift fur Geopolitik had considerable influence upon the German Far Eastern outlook as well as upon Reichswehr circles. His real hour, however, came with Hitler's accession to power. Rudolf Hess, Hitler's deputy in the leadership of the Nazi Party, had been Haushofer's A. D. C. throughout the war and later on for a time his assistant at his institute for "Geopolitik." Through him Haushofer had come into contact with the Nazi movement almost from the beginning. In the days of its greatest defeat, after the abortive "Putsch" in Munich in 1923, he had hidden Hess himself and the archives of the party on his farm in the Bavarian uplands. He had been almost alone in visiting Adolf Hitler, when imprisoned in the little Bavarian fortrews of Landshut on Lech. Thus, although his marriage to a lady of Jewish extraction made official affiliation to the party impossible, he exercised through his contacts with its leading figures a profound influence upon its policies—in particular in the field of foreign affairs—much to the indignation of the racial purists in its inner circles.

Behind the convenient camouflage of the party's official doctrine the programme, which he first outlined in his great clarion calls to German youth in 1924, has today been brought nearer success. In seeking a rapprochment with Russia, Herr Hitler has adopted the policy of an influential wing within the party, which is also the policy of the General Staff. Such a rapproachement, if the Russians play the game as Haushofer wants them to play it, does not necessarily mean any disturbance of the older agreement with Japan under the anti-Comintern Pact, though it may disturb the Japanese Army for which the securing of Germany's assistance in the case of a Far Eastern struggle with the Soviet Union was the main factor in inducing her to sign that agreement. But on Haushofer's policy Russian and Japanese agreements would both be instruments in the same great plan, which aims at nothing less than the revolutionising of the "Colonial World" against the capitalist rule of the Western Democracies and the establishment of a New World Order, in which Berlin would distribute the spheres of influence amongst its partners and, where necessary, mediate between them. Whether Stalin, who, unlike the statesmen of the West, has studied the writings of the Nazis, will find the role allotted to him by the professor of Geopolitics sufficiently attractive is quite another question.

NOTES.

Bargaining ?—Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Sir Jagdish Prasad have both deprecated any bargaining by India with Great Britain for the support which she is bound to give in the present war. Sir Jagdish Prasad is a member of the Government of India and if his speech in the Council of State was made in a purely official capacity, we should not be justified in applying to it tests which are inappropriate to official pronouncements which expound policies and which may or may not coincide with the speaker's beliefs and convictions. Sir Jagadish, however, prefaced his statement with an avowal that he was speaking as an Indian; and that is our excuse for endeavouring to see how far his observations showed a correct understanding of the Indian standpoint. When we say 'the Indian standpoint,' we do not mean a standpoint which would evoke the loudest applause at a public meeting. We mean that which a study of India's history and culture and the instincts into which these have crystallised, point as the direction to which the public mind is most likely to incline. Now, what is it that these two distinguished Indians deprecate when they deprecate bargaining? So far as we understand, it is the demand, petition or prayer that the political constitution of the country should be made such as would allow the men and women of India to grow to the full height of their physical, intellectual and spiritual stature. This is the aim and object, or should be the aim and object, of constitutional reform. How can this be called bargaining? You expect and require Indians to pull their weight in the Commonwealth like the self-governing Dominions. Is it bargaining if Indians plead that you should give them the same opportunities of self-development as has been given to these sister nations of the Commonwealth, in order that they may be able to do so? If Sir Jagdish asks his servant to go to Cape Comorin and bring him a handful of the famous sands in twenty-four hours' time, he should endow him with a pair of wings or else present him an airplane with sufficient petrol to last the journey. He should also have trained the man thoroughly to handle the intricate mechanism of the craft. If the servant on receiving Sir Jagdish's order, pleads respectfully like the 'mendicant' Liberals or demands turbulently like the khadi-clad Satyagrahi, that he has neither wings, nor a plane nor training in piloting the plane and that, therefore, arrangements should be promptly made to supply him with them so that he may efficiently and expeditiously carry out his master's order, is it right to scold him for trying to drive a bargain? Sir Jagdish said that the cause of Polish freedom was that of human freedom. Does it mean that as soon as Poland succeeds with the help of her great and powerful allies in repelling the German invasion, all countries including India will achieve their freedom? Sir Jagadish knows more than any other Indian the actual position of Indians in different parts of the Empire. He has striven hard to bring about an improvement in it and he knows how hard it is to secure even some small relief. Indians have the will but with these and similar handicaps, their contribution to the service of the Empire must lack in the fulness which comes of spontaneity. It is above all the duty of those who wish India to make her full contribution to the safety and stability of the Commonwealth, to take every opportunity of securing to the Indian people free access to the sun and air without which their growth must be stunted and they themselves be a drag on the Commonwealth. Since writing the above, we have seen Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's timely suggestion that the basis of the Central Government should be widened in order to strengthen the solidarity of the administration, which otherwise might tend to weaken under the stress of provincial autonomies, now that the Federation, which was to be the coping stone of the new constitution, has been indefinitely postponed. Nothing more is intended by those who incorporate much the same sort of suggestion in the support which they offered to Britain in the war.

Federation Suspended :—The Viceroy addressed a joint session of the Council of State and the Indian Legislative Assembly on Monday. His Excellency delivered a message from His Majesty the King. It ran as follows;

In these days, when the whole of civilisation is threatened, the widespread attachment of India to the cause in which we have taken up arms has been a source of deep satisfaction to me. I also value most highly the many and generous offers of assistance made to me by the Princes and people of India. I am confident that, in the struggle upon which I and my peoples have now entered, we can count on sympathy and support from every quarter of the Indian continent in the face of a common danger. Britain is fighting for no selfish ends but for the maintenance of a principle vital to the future of mankind—the principle that relations between civilised states must be regulated, not by force, but by reason and law, so that men may live free from the terror of war, to pursue the happiness and well-being which should be the destiny of mankind.

(Signed) GEORGE, R. I.

Indian readers would have raised their eyebrows when they came upon the phrase "the Indian continent" in the Royal message. It is generally known nowadays that Royal messages are carefully edited by Ministers. Partition as a means of solving communal rivalries is in the air. Is there any significance in the use of the word "continent" instead of "country"? If so, what? If Russia, the United States and China are countries, why should that well-understood word be denied to India? Perhaps, we are reading more into the word than was intended. Our excuse is that Sir Samuel Hoare is a member of the Cabinet. The Viceroy's announcement that his great achievement, the Federation, will be suspended, cannot but cause a pang in Sir Samuel's heart. Does the word "continent" imply that, though India has escaped Federation, she may have to face partition at the end of the war? However that may be, the Government of India, now that Federation has gone into the back-ground, should be readjusted in relation to the autonomous provinces. The amendment of the Government of India Act which was carried through Parliament last week and the Defence of India Act, give increased control of the provinces to the centre. But what is needed is not control but co-ordination. The Central Government should be expanded so as to include non-official representatives. Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, Mr. Jinnah and Mr. Aney, all members of the Legislative Assembly, and leaders of their respective political parties, may be co-opted to the Governor-General's Cabinet. Pandit Hridayanath Kunzru, President of the Liberal Federation to whose views the National Congress is steadily approximating, and a member of the Council of State, would naturally also be co-opted. All four are tried and responsible Indian leaders and their association with the Central Government will make it strong in council and inspire considerable confidence in the country.

Indian Unity:—Innumerable illustrations can be given to show that India is a country organically related in all its parts, the most distant from each other. Here is one from the last Sunday edition of the Hindu of Madras. Badrinath is a famous shrine seated several thousands of feet aloft amidst the eternal snows of the Himalayas. A recent pilgrim to this shrine contributes an interesting account of his experiences to the journal. Incidentally he mentions that the Raval or the High Priest of the shrine is chosen from one of the Nambudiri families by the Travancore State, in the extreme south, approved by the Maharaja of Tehri Himalayan State, and installed as the Trustee of the temple shrine to manage its affairs, both temporal and spiritual. This custom dates from the time of the first Shankaracharya, the founder of the shrine, who was a native of a village in Travancore, of the Nambudiri Brahmin caste and must be at least a thousand years old. Throughout the millennium, in spite of all political vicissitudes, the custom has been followed without a break. Thousands of pilgrims from all parts of the country, and of all castes undertake this arduous pilgrimage every year with practically little equipment, and along the mountain route at convenient intervals are rest-houses and other amenities provided by the piety of devotees. The writer in the Hindu speaks with great enthusiasm of the excellence of the arrangements on the way, available alike to rich and poor which has been in existence from ancient times without any official control. The whole thing seems to work automatically like so many other things in Indian life.

India and the War:—The announcement that the British Government is making preparations in the expectation that the war may last three years is perplexing. Two Great Powers are ranged together in this conflict with a third Power which has risen to greatness within the last six years from the state of utter depression in which she managed to emerge from the last war and the Treaty of Versailles. All the other countries, great and small, have declared their neutrality and are standing by, interested witnesses of this gladiatorial scene. These Powers have all joined in denouncing the aggression of Japan on China, of Italy on Ethiopia. They can not surely regard the invasion of Poland in a different light, more especially as it involves their own authority as member States of the League of Nations. But they seem to do so. They seem to regard "collective security" as a greater danger to their security than neutrality. But the point we wish to emphasise in connection with the announcement of the British Government is that in framing their policies the conditions of India should be given prominent consideration. To concentrate on European conditions and leave India to adjust her affairs to whatever may be found necessary to meet European conditions, is neither fair to this country nor advantageous to the Empire. We noticed with amazement that the Secretary of State for India is not in the War Cabinet. Lord Zetland seems either to have effaced himself completely or to have been left out as a negligible quantity. India has cause to be disappointed in either case. In view of the obvious fact that none of the slogans suitable to Great Britain and the self-governing Dominions are suitable to India—General Smuts has made the future of South-West Africa the decisive factor in moving him to oppose General Hertzog's policy of neutrality. Something should be done to inspire an active interest in the prosecution of the war in the Indian people. Passive acquiescence or even sympathy if prolonged must lapse into indifference. Notwithstanding that nishkama karma or action without thought of reward is ingrained in the culture of India, and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's and Sir Jagadish Prasad's appeals to this ancient precept will find more acceptance among Indians than among other nations, the western idea that the workman is worthy of his hire, has gained much ground, and it is necessary to hold out some concrete gain in addition to the spiritual value of nishkama karma in order to meet this contemporary development, particularly among the younger generations.

Defence of S. Africa and India :—Our comments on the Chatfield Committee's thesis that India should fix her first lines of defence against aggressive powers in Egypt and Singapore, receive unexpected but weighty confirmation in the observations of an authority eminent both as soldier and as statesman, on the defence of South Africa which is the nearest analogy to India that can be thought of. In his first pronouncement as Prime Minister on the Defence policy of his Government, General Smuts declared that South African participation in the war must necessarily be limited by considerations of geography and the special conditions attaching to the country. He went on to say :

> Their primary duty was to place their own defences in the highest state of efficiency in order to render the Union safe against any inroads. Clearly at this stage, Government could not give encouragement to citizens who wished to serve overseas. It was for the Union to give physical (sic) support in all questions of trade, shipping and finance.

These sentiments apply word for word to India's defence problem. Like India, South Africa is surrounded on three sides by the sea. Unlike India South Africa is undefended on the fourth side by a great mountain barrier. A part of the territory of the Union, that held under a Mandate from the League, was taken from the Germans at the last war. The restoration of South-West Africa to the Reich is one of the cherished objects of Herr Hitler. There is, therefore, a definite danger to the Union on that side instead of an undefined possibility as in the case of India. To the defence of the Union on the northern frontier, it will be of vital importance if the enemy is stopped in Egypt. The Chatfield Committee's reasoning has therefore, more application to South Africa than to India. Singapore, again, is more important to South Africa than to India. The Japanese who are supposed to be the likely aggressors, want before everything land for their overflow population to settle on. Their statesmen have declared that they do not contemplate settling it in any tropical country. Moreover, the standard of life in this country is not higher than that in Japan and the tide of emigration, unlike water, tends to flow from a lower to a higher level. South Africa rather than India is, therefore, likely to attract Japanese aggression if there is really going to be any. Here, again, Singapore is more accessible to South Africa than to India. These considerations which bulk so largely in the eyes of the Chatfield Committee and the British Government with reference to India, have not occurred to the expert judgment of General Smuts. Nor has the British Government thought of suggesting to him the advisability of basing the defence of his country on Singapore and Egypt. If they did, he would perhaps dismiss it as a wild-cat scheme which will weaken rather than strengthen the defensive resources of the Union.

Mr. Chamberlain Corrects Lord Halifax :—The leader headed "A Lost Opportunity" in this issue was written immediately after reading Lord Halifax's astounding declaration in the House of Lords on Wednesday that His Majesty's Government's undertaking at the outbreak of the war not to bomb undefended places and civilian populations, was contingent on the enemy observing the same restraint. As the Germans had proclaimed their intention to ignore their own previous assurances on this matter, the inference was that the British too would not feel bound by theirs. We are glad that the impression conveyed by the Foreign Minister's impulsive declaration, reported to have been received with applause by such a staid audience as the House of Lords, has been promptly corrected by the Prime Minister in a statement next day in the House of Commons. Mr. Chamberlain said : "Whatever be the lengths to which others may go, His Majesty's Government will never resort to a deliberate attack on women, children and other civilians for purposes of mere terrorism." The declaration might have been more unqualifield than it is but it is a distinct improvement on the Foreign Secretary's, and will be received with much relief in this country which has to share the responsibility without sharing the councils of those in authority in this War. There seems to be a doubt about the authenticity of the declaration attributed to German Command and that also is a ray of hope in the deepening gloom of these days.

The Congress on the War:—The Working Committee of the Indian National Congress has, after a week's deliberation at Wardha, released in a statement to the press its considered opinion on the European War. The statement has been carefully drawn up and it is on the face of it a formula based on the largest measure of agreement possible between different sections in the party. It is further reported that efforts will be made by Congress leaders to rally other political parties to the Congress attitude. In brief, the statement seeks from Britain an elucidation of the democratic and humanitarian principles involved in the present War and their applicability to India.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, September 16, 1939.

A LOST OPPORTUNITY.

When the present war commenced a fortnight back, Herr Hitler announced that he had given strict injunctions to his air force to attack only military objectives. A few days ago, in reply to a question in Parliament, His Majesty's Government said that, so far as their information went, the Germans were adhering to their leaders' injunction to discriminate in their operations between military areas and open towns and villages, though several civilian lives were lost in spite of the care shown by the German bombers. This week, it is reported that Herr Hitler has declared his intention to abandon the humane principle of discrimination and has ordered his officers not to spare the civilian population, his excuse being that the Polish Government are encouraging the people to indulge in free lance hostilities, thus disentitling them to the exemptions due to non-combatants. This practically means that the war in Poland is to be a war of extermination. The announcement would have been received everywhere with feelings of horror and detestation. Apart from the merits of the German claims, this cynical avowal of brutality must arouse passionate indignation in every one who has a spark of humanity in him. Here was a great opportunity for Great Britain to win the admiration of the world by refusing to imitate Herr Hitler, grave though the provocation is. We fully expected she would not miss it on any account. We deeply regret that this precious opportunity has been thrown away. In answer to a question in the House of Lords as to the attitude of His Majesty's Government in the face of Herr Hitler's declaration, Lord Halifax of all men stated that the British Government would follow Herr Hitler's example and show no discrimination between civilian and military population in its operations against Germany since the German Chancellor has declared that he would show none in Poland. In other words, Britain will carry on a war of extermination in Germany, because Herr Hitler does so in Poland.

The present war, it has been authoritatively declared, is waged for the vindication of humanitarian principles against the arrogance of brute force. It has been described as a war to end Hitlerism. Whether eventually it will succeed in doing this or not, immediately Hitlerism has achieved a notable triumph. It has imposed upon Britain the same methods which it has felt no scruples to adopt. It would have been a resounding moral victory for Great Britain if her Government had resolutely declared: "Whatever Herr Hitler may do, we mean unswervingly to stand by the principles dictated by humanity and religion even though for the moment it may seem to put us at a disadvantage. This is a war for principles and will be fought with due regard to them." We cannot speak for o... nations. dispute over Danzig and the Corridor, Mr. Chamberlain has repeatedly affirmed, can be settled by conference and negotiation. The leaflet that was scattered from airplanes over Germany cited the precedents of the Saar, the Anschluss, and Czecho-slovakia as analogies. Hitler, as observed by the shrewd Japanese Premier, has grossly miscalculated his own strength. He must have already realised his mistake, which has cost both Poland and his own country enormous losses in life and property. If all the nations which, whether from motives of timidity or prudence, have now preferred to remain neutral, come together in conference with Great Britain, France, Soviet Russia and the United States, and tell the Fuerher to stop his murderous campaign or face the united strength of the whole world, the War must end at once. And that is what would be best in the interests of all nations, including Germany.

MR. KUMARAPPA'S APOLOGIA.

The one fact that emerges out of the mathematical formulae in which Mr. J. C. Kumarappa, the talented Secretary of the All India Village Industries Association, explains his resignation from the National Planning Committee appointed by the Congress, is that there was no common ground between this earnest advocate of Gandhian economics and the other eminent Congress and non-Congress Indians who formed the Committee. Mr. Kumarappa, in plain words, wanted to subordinate large-scale industries to cottage and village industries. Few Congressmen share this ambition. Most members of the party, probably the overwhelming majority, regard the village industries programme as a concession to retain Gandhiji's leadership. A minority regard charka spinning as a useful way of supplementing the agriculturist's meagre income. All look upon the programme of the Spinners' Association as economically unsound; khadi is growing increasingly unsaleable despite party drives to clear off accumulated stocks under the forced stimulus of Gandhiji Jayanti Weeks. After an amiable digression into the military burden, the high salaries and the high pensions and "other internal causes," Gandhiji in his Harijan (dated August 26) concedes that "the painful fact has been brought home by khadi workers that, in spite of all the will in the world, the middle class khadi buyer simply has not the money to buy khadi at the increased price necessitated by the rise in wages beyond the point of three annas." In another article in the same issue Gandhiji carries the argument still further. He writes, "We may not be satisfied until khadi becomes an article of universal wear. It may be that in the prosecution of our search we may find, as some suggest we shall, that khadi can never become an economic proposition. We should then have no hesitation in making the admission however much it may hurt our pride and demolish the proposition we have hitherto advanced with so much confidence." It is the great faith of Gandhiji and of followers like Mr. Kumarappa alone that prevents them from frankly recognising the uneconomic nature of the khadi experiment. Gandhiji's latest suggestion for making it economically sound is through Government subsidy. "The subsidy," he writes in Harijan, September 2, "can be raised by taxing the sales of mill manufactures; the fines collected from uncertified dealers (in khadi) may also..... be paid to the A. I. S. A." The Spinners' Association is to be something like the Zanzibar Clove-Growers' Association over which political controversy raged recently. There is no reason to think that this monopoly would be more public-spirited than other monopolies have been in the past. The tax on sales of mill cloth—this we presume is what is meant by "manufactures" —must by its nature depend on public purchases on a large scale; the amount of the fines similarly must vary with the number of uncertified dealers. Even the prestige which association with the party in power has given it for the past two years has failed to push khadi sales any further.

It must have been his unbounded enthusiasm for the cause which made Mr. Kumarappa recommend the methods of the Spinners' Association to his Planning Committee colleagues. Mr. Kumarappa's statement is a piece of special pleading for one system over another which he covers up by putting forward the villager as the centre of his scheme. There is nothing in what he says to show that propped up village industries are better than large scale production. The introduction of "centralised and decentralised methods of production" is a red-herring drawn across the path of his readers. Electricity which requires centralised methods, is a great factor in "decentralising" production. Mr. Kumarappa apparently accepts the need for electrification when he says, "the method of large scale production can only be employed as a handmaiden of the cottage and village industries." But who is to say where the method should stop? The railway is the thin end of the industrial wedge. Congressmen, though they may travel third class, by no means object to the railroad—even on principle. Generally the slowing down of industrial activities in one direction leads to speeding up elsewhere. On the textile side we see the Congress exalting the charka as the salvation of the country; on the transport side, the railway, the automobile and the aeroplane are freely used by Congress leaders. We regret Mr. Kumarappa's resignation from the Planning Committee, which even without him is a grouping of incompatibles. We had hoped when his appointment was announced that he would be a moderating influence on the industrialization group on the Committee and that they in turn would temper his zeal for village economics. Mr. Kumarappa, on the contrary, has after seven months of disputation finally broken from the Committee, confirmed in his previous opinions and rather contemptuous of his dissenting colleagues. "My experience of over seven months on the Planning Committee," he writes, "convinced me that hardly anyone appreciated this all important factor." He has moreover closed the door against any other village industries man taking his place, as "there can be no compromise between the two methods."

It is quite clear to us where the difference arises. Mr. Kumarappa's thesis on the formula that Wealth is to be measured by the employment of human talent plus the means of production available, is, as he himself concedes, not accepted by the National Planners. That thesis is that Wealth is constant and means of production scarce. If this is to be so in perpetuity, we can have no quarrel with a government which adopts the Kumarappa way out of the difficulty. It may even go a step further and distribute charkas all round. But the National Planner differs in this very thing. He wants to increase national wealth and, as this cannot be done by just increasing the human talent already employed, he seeks to do so by forced marches towards industrialisation. That is the other extreme. Unless national wealth increases under an Indian Government, there would be one reason less for substituting a Brown bureaucracy for a White bureaucracy. The task of people like Mr. Kumarappa, one would have thought, was to prevent industrialism from deteriorating into industrialisation; to see that the increase in means of production did not occur in circumstances that threw the life of the people out of gear. In this limited but very useful sphere he could have rendered valuable service not only to the peasant whose cause he has so greatly at heart, but to the country as a whole. After all, the one thing that is certain is that means of production will increase and improve, and that national wealth will grow. We shall best help adjust the people to the coming change not by driving them in the totalitarian manner along the grooves of progress as the Planners would have it; nor by holding down National Wealth and retarding progress in the means of production as Mr. Kumarappa seems to seek; but by securing that progress, economic and industrial, does not press heavily on the human element. That Mr. Kumarappa has failed to do by his uncompromising attitude on the Committee.

THE JEWISH PROBLEM.

(By Miss M. Gommes.)

The Jews—the word, to-day, is in every mind, in every mouth. The topic may be Hitler, Palestine or Unemployment, it may be art, science, psychology or finance, there comes a moment when the Jews are always brought in. It never solves any problem but they are the usual emotional explanation, the outlet for strong passions such as hatred or blind worship. They are being labelled as a peculiar species of humanity. Some, it is true, are rather pleased and proud of this publicity, whatever that may give them, but a good many who would like to live normally as ordinary human beings, suffer from being looked upon as animals in a human zoo.

In the name of humanity, people want to help the Jews; for the sake of the same humanity, they also want them exterminated. The Jews themselves are divided; they have had to struggle for so many centuries that they will not give up the fight now, while at the same time they can not see that their problem will never be solved. Let us examine what it is that creates the problem and whether there is anything that prevents it from ever finding a solution.

For most people to-day, the word 'Jew' has become synonymous with 'refugee,' and 'refugee' again has become synonymous with 'forced kindness;' now, whenever a thing is forced upon one there is resentment, which very quickly turns to hatred: that is partly why Hitler's campaign may finally induce the world to assent to anti-semitism. But why did he start it at all, and again, why throughout the history of the world do we find that every century or so, such a campaign is being carried on? Is there in the Jew something not to be found in other races, which makes him an object of hatred to his fellow-men, or, is anti-semitism merely the necessary buffer for a humanity which has to have an outlet for its too great supressed emotions?

The development of society throughout the world shows from the very beginning of every civilization a brutal force which, as man grows, is gradually canalised and made more refined, more 'civilised'; in time, this animal instinct gets so dressed up and hidden as to make it almost impossible for anyone to detect it. It apparently disappears altogether. This marks the apex of a civilization. It is the time when we find fewest wars, the best artists and writers, the most outstanding scientists. But in itself, civilization because it has its origin in man's mind, is not a real thing: it is born of his fears and desires. However much he is able to cover and hide his real constitution, man can never hope to see that any part of his make-up will completely disappear; all he can do is to hide, to a greater or less degree, those parts of himself which do not fit into the mould. But Nature is still there: sooner or later she gets her revenge, and that which man had taken such infinite pains and aeons of time to hide comes bursting forth under one form or another. When Nature thus gets the upper hand such catastrophes as wars, revolutions, brutalities of all kinds take place, and these, being against the pattern that man has woven of society, have to be checked. How can they be, and how can Nature use her rights without upsetting this very fragile card-house which is called civilization?

The problem up till now has been solved in different ways according to the times and to the extent of man's fears, but, on the whole, we find that the best way he could devise for wriggling out of the difficulty was to let loose and encourage some strong emotion such as hatred: not only was it an excellent substitute for other forbidden emotions, but it also allowed his fears to be pacified and forgotten for a while.

This may well be the basic reason which lies at the bottom of the hatred of the Jews.

A Jew settling in a place, usually brings out this comment: 'Beware!', implying, "He will try and get our money. He will want to get into our family. By every possible means, he will suck us, and since he is clever, we will be left naked." All this is meant, and many more things which all boil down to a terrific unavowed fear. Whether this fear is based upon anything real is what we will try to find out now.

The word which always come to one's lips, when a Jew is mentioned, is 'money.' The Jew is ever wanting money: if he has none, he wants some; if he has some, he wants more. He definitely has a money complex. But so has the rest of mankind, for every human being longs for security, and money is the usual way of obtaining it; the difference is that when a non-Jew gets money, he generally buys property, surrounds himself with more security, while the Jew, on the whole, invests his money, makes more; he may buy jewels or other riches besides money, but they will always be movable things which he can carry with him or on him. This, I should say, comes from the fact that unconsciously he knows that he will never be allowed to stay in a country for more than a limited time. He may live in one place happily all his life, but usually his sons or grandsons will go through an anti-semitic period which will oblige them to flee from that country they have learned to consider their own. Had they possessed land, they would have had to leave it behind and start again with nothing.

So in this respect, all the difference between the Jew and the non-Jew is that, although both have a money-complex born of a fear, one can see the Jew's money in its crude shape, while the non-Jew's fortune has taken the shape of lands, estates, etc..... The Jew, it is true, often makes himself extremely repulsive to the non-Jew by the way he boasts of this money, carries his diamonds in a conspicuous manner, and dresses loudly.

It is a psychological fact that a long repressed child inevitably develops an inferiority complex which according to his temperament, manifests itself in what may seem to be a feeling of superiority. What is true of a child, is also true of a race, and since the Jews have never had a real chance of adaptation, never have been truly considered as the equals of the people in whose country they are living, they have developed this exhibitionism which is really an inferiority. The only reason why they have taken this particular type of inferiority complex, so objectionable to the non-Jew, is probably that fundamentally they are an Eastern race and love colour and 'splash.'

But this money complex and this showing off are not sufficient reasons in themselves to explain people's hatred of the Jews. There must be some other more deeply rooted reason to account for such an attitude.

One other grievance of the "Aryan" against the Jew is the latter's quickness of mind and his intelligence. I wonder whether the Jews really are more intelligent than the non-Jews, what gives that feeling to the "Aryan," and what proofs he has of such a superiority. It is undeniable that in almost every field of human activity there is a Jew; it is also certain that most often this Jew is the head of the activity. And when there is one Jew, sooner or later, there are twenty Jews! This, of course, is very aggravating to the "Aryan"! "Why," says he, "should there always be a Jew before me?" and he adds: "I have allowed him to come and live in my country, and now, he has taken my job and is preventing my getting the best one; indeed, he is ousting me from my own country."

There is genuine disgust, envy and jealousy in this cry of the "Aryan," but there is certainly good ground for these feelings, for whether we take Science, Art, Psychology, or any other branch of activity, a Jew is there to direct and lead the way. I do not believe, however, that this is sufficient proof of his intelligence over the non-Jew, for when we examine the history of the so-called "Chosen People," we cannot help noticing the incredible number of blunders they have made throughout their adventurous life, and we are filled with admiration at the leniency of their God, who, despite the short-sightedness and apparent stupidity of the Israelites, still goes on calling them "His People."

The reason for the position that the Jew manages to win in every country is not so much his intelligence, therefore, as rather his extraordinary intuition and sensitiveness. These two qualities are inherent in every living species that wants to survive despite difficult, not to say impossible, outward conditions.

These conditions, for the Jews, came into existence with the creation of Ghettos, i. e., with segregation; from the very beginning of their emigration, the Jews were ostracised and obliged to live apart: on that condition only were they allowed to stay in a country. In order to live, they had to develop qualities which were latent in them, but which, if we are to believe the Scriptures, did not develop until they came to live under those circumstances.

One cannot help wondering whether the Jew would have developed such characteristics as seem to be the basis of his temperament now, had he been allowed to mix and assimilate with the people of the countries to which he came. To say that the grievance of the non-Jew is the 'raison d'etre' of his loathing the Jew, is really putting the cart before the horse, for it obviously was the "Aryan" attitude which developed in the Jew those characteristics which he now objects to. Hatred was the cause for the growth of such a temperament; it was not, as is usually thought, the result of it.

The "Aryan" assuming that Jews are incapable of real adaptation would, therefore, be glad to do away with them. But can they disappear under the present conditions? The majority of them definitely do want to assimilate; they call themselves British, French, German, before remembering that they are Jews.

If they were allowed to live as real citizens of the country in which they have settled, if Aryans and non-Aryans were allowed to forget their different races, would they not mix very rapidly for the good of their countries, and would it not be soon impossible to know a Jew from a non-Jew? The whole problem would then be solved. But this will not happen.

There is something tragically grotesque about the whole question. It is impossible to-day, for any human being to proclaim the purity of his origin, for there is now no such thing as a pure race. Why then, when people have mixed ever since the world has been, do they so strictly draw the line at the Jews? What is the fundamental reason for this, and has it anything at all to do with the Jews? I think not. Jews are a necessity. No one, not even Hitler, wants them to disappear. Society, as it is now, is so repressed in all ways that a violent emotional outlet is an absolute necessity to keep it from collapsing. If there were no Jews, Jews would have to be invented. The problem, therefore, is not a 'Jewish Problem'; it is something far greater and far more tragic for there seems to be no solution to it; so long as man does not see what a fallacy his dream of civilization has proved, it will be a Problem of Society.

THE TRAVANCORE UNIVERSITY MANUSCRIPTS LIBRARY.

(By A. Padmanabha Iyer.)

Though one of the chief aims of the Travancore University, as defined in the Preamble of the Travancore University Regulation, is to provide for the conservation and promotion of Kerala Art and Culture, it was decided as a matter of policy to extend the sphere of its usefulness to a wider extent and attach to the University an Oriental Manuscripts Library. This branch of study received the special attention of Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer. After careful consideration it was resolved to organise this institution under the Department of Oriental Studies.

About a year ago the Government requisitioned the services of that expert in the line of manuscript collection, Mr. R. A. Sastri, who has been engaged in this task for the past fifty years and is well posted in information as regards manuscript works in India literally and truly from Kashmir to Cape Comorin and from Sind to Assam. It has been his favourate pastime to travel all over India and abroad, for he has travelled in Europe and Great Britain and has gone even to the Arctic region in search of knowledge. The forethought of Government deserves to be applauded in having entrusted this task to Mr. Sastri whose vast experience, great learning and broad culture, not to speak of his passionate love of the subject, have been harnessed to the best advantage of the latest University in India. His intimate and unmatched knowledge of the sources of Oriental Manuscripts whether in Peshawar, Benares, Assam, Tibet, Sind, Poona, etc., has enabled him to secure for the Travancore University several and valuable Manuscripts from all parts of India. Though it is not a year since the Oriental Manuscripts Library was organised under his control, he has been able to get nearly 4,000 manuscripts, a creditable and valuable collection for the new University. The collections include rare works on the different branches of knowledge and the fact that the older Universities in India have begun to apply for copies of manuscripts which they have not been able to secure elsewhere, is an eloquent testimony to these being not only rare but valuable. I had the pleasure of visiting this Library a few months ago when I found the collections outgrowing the building.

As one interested in the subject, I visited this institution a few days ago and was pleased to find the enormous growth of this excellent collection. As I stated already, the mere number of manuscripts had reached very near 4,000. It was only a few months ago that the institution boasted of the possession of some rare manuscripts like Al Majesty, a work on Astronomy, Arvamuni Sri Mula Kalpam, a work on Buddhist Tantra, Pasupata Sutra, a valuable treatise on Saivite cult, Agni Vesya Sutra, etc. This time when I went to this institution, I was told that Mr. Sastri was able to get some more rare and valuable works. The first and foremost of these was Sownaka Grihya Sutram (Aphorism). This is a work dealing with the Samaskaras or purifactory ceremonies from birth to death. This is complete in 31 Patalams. This was obtained from a member of Appaya Dikshidar in Coimbatore who lived in the fifteenth century and was a well known Sanskrit scholar, referred to in the Catalogue of Oriental Scholars published in Germany (Berlin) in 1892. This Appaya Dikshidar is described as son of Ramanuja Dikshidar, Guru of Dharmayya Dikshidar. Sixty-six works are attributed to him. Another manuscript obtained from the same family is Samaveda Bhashya also complete. Another rare work in manuscripts which has come to this institution is Grahyayana Sroutra Sutra with Bhashya. This was obtained by Mr. Sastri with great effort from the rare collections of Raju Sastriar of Mannarkudi. The rarity and value of this collection could be easily understood when it is mentioned that Mr. Burnell, the well known Sanskrit scholar, who was District and Sessions Judge, Tanjore, tried his best to have a look into it but failed first. It is said that he was able to visit the house where these collections were preserved with an introduction from the then Governor of Madras. Even then he was not admitted into the house, as he was a Mlecha but he was not to be discomfited. He began to recite Vedas which surprised and moved the then owner of the collections so much that the European savant was readily shown the manuscripts and was even allowed to take whatever manuscripts he wanted. It is not known to what extent he availed himself of the offer made. With considerable tact and difficulty Mr. R. A. Sastri was able to secure the manuscripts mentioned above, which, it is said, was published in 1513 A. D.

Mr. Sastri added another interesting work in Manuscript to the Library and that is Rig Veda Bhashya, a complete work, highly valued by the Sanskrit scholars in Northern India. It would appear that those responsible for the publication of the Tilak Memorial Edition of Vedas wanted a West Coast Edition of this manuscript. When Mr. Sastri was examining a house in Cochin for manuscripts he came by this work in complete form. The publishers of the Tilak Memorial Edition being anxious to get a copy of this edition, they have been asked by Mr Sastri to apply to the authorities of the Travancore University.

The subject of Yegna (Sacrifice) is now attracting considerable attention from the West and the savants in England are issuing a publication on the subject with drawings of Diagrams on this subject. Mr. Sastri has been in search of Diagrams and Manuscripts on this highly interesting and instructive subject. When he was ransacking old manuscripts in the family of the old Ruling House of Tanjore, he came by a bundle of charts, diagrams and drawings to illustrate these sacrifices of different kinds. These appear to be complete and surprisingly fresh so far as the figures are concerned. The magnificent originality of these figures will strike anyone as singular. As, however, the paper on which these figures are drawn exactly to modern geometrical proportions, is torn, it is highly necessary to get them copied by competent hands and preserve them from further destruction. They are in Marathi characters and are perfectly legible and are reported to be 250 years old. These Diagrams ought to be very useful in making a study of the subject of Yegna which, it is believed, has degenerated from its old estate.

OUT OF ONE'S ELEMENT.

(By J. C. Kumarappa).

A seat was provided for me on the National Planning Committee, not in my personal capacity, but as a representative of the ideal underlying the Village Industries Association. I have now vacated that seat and so I owe it to those who hold to that ideal as an article of faith, to explain my action and the reason why I felt like a fish out of water in that committee and so had to get out for the sake of my very existence.

As the space at my disposal is limited, I cannot deal here with the legal, political and constitutional differences but shall merely content myself with referring those who are interested in these to the Congress Bulletin No. 3 of 1939 in which the correspondence between the President and my self has been published. In this note we shall confine ourselves to the consideration of the economic aspect only.

According to the conception of the economic organisation on which our Association in based, the villager is taken as the centre around whom the universe revolves. What contributes to his welfare is primary and everything else is secondary. Whatever the merits of a plan may be, if it fails to give employment and thereby direct a due share of the wealth produced towards the villager, it will stand condemned. The result or end of economic activity is wealth production for consumption by the producers. Wealth is usually produced by the intelligent use of the means of production and the application or employment of human talent or power. Planning, in the first instance, consists in the rational co-ordination of these three factors. We may express this mathematically thus : where W stands for wealth, E for employment of human talent, and M for means in the shape of tools, equipment or capital. In this equation, keeping W constant, if M is large, E will have to be small and vice versa, that is E and M vary inversely. Therefore, in planning, our first step will have to be the ascertaining of the availability of E and M.

In Great Britain, at the time of the Industrial Revolution, when capitalism was "planned" without a fanfare of trumpets there was a glut of M due to fortuitous circumstances such as the loot from India. Therefore the system evolved used more capital and less labour.

In the New World, on the other hand, there was a scarcity of E as the people were few, so they had to increase the only factor capable of increase, i. e. M by borrowing capital.

So we see that, in the cases of both Great Britain and the United States of America, the unconscious Planning resulted in Capitalism, in the former case due to capital being large, and in the latter case labour being scarce. We cannot adopt their methods without scrutinising the factors available to us.

When we look around our country we find E in abundance while M is very scarce, and therefore, if our planning is to be effective we have to lay our foundation stone on labour and not on capital.

My experience of over seven months on the Planning Committee convinced me that hardly any one appreciated this all important factor.

Again, the function of large scale industry was not clearly understood. Most people seemed to think that all would be well as long as we produced large quantities of standardised goods. They could not see that the method of large scale production can only be employed as a handmaiden of the Cottage and village industries, the former supplying the basic needs of the latter on a service basis. Again, if we may have mathematical symbols, we may compare the economic relationship between these two methods of production to that between the State and the Citizen in the political or social sphere as Centralised : Decentralised :: State : Citizen.

Properly conceived the State should serve the citizen. The citizen may work for his profit but not so the State. Similarly, the decentralised units may work for profit but not so the centralised units. Just as the State cannot be allowed to compete with the citizen, so also the centralised industries should not be allowed to enter the field of production of decentralised industries. If this line of demarcation is not kept clearly in view it will spell disaster.

The Planning Committee has proceeded to form Sub-Committees vertically i. e. emphasising the functions and thus making them into separate industries e. g. Banking, Insurance, etc., which is the way of capitalism. The other way would have been to take the industries horizontally and study their processes and apply the functional aid at suitable points. Taking for instance, the textile industry, they would have arranged for the buying of cotton instead of financing the cotton buyer, and they would sell the goods instead of arranging markets. The plan of work of the All India Spinners' Association is a good example of a horizontal system of planning, while a spinning mill is an example of vertical planning. There can be no compromise between these two methods.

I fear that if we proceed to plan without a keen appreciation of the two foregoing factors, we shall only be substituting brown capitalism for the white variety we are so familiar with. Who shall say whether our second state will not be worse than the first ?

SIR RADHAKRISHNAN AND BENARES UNIVERSITY.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya has issued the following :—

"It is a matter of thankfulness that Dr. Sir Radhakrishnan has at my request agreed to take up the Vice-Chancellorship of the Benares Hindu University. Sir Sarvapalli occupies a unique position in the academic world. He is the Spalding Professor for life of Eastern Religion and Ethics at Oxford. He is also the George V Professor of Philosophy and President of Post-Graduate Council in Arts in the University of Calcutta. He is a distinguished member of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation at Geneva. He was the Vice-Chancellor of the Andhra University for a period of 5 years. Recently he has been elected a member of the British Academy, being the first Indian to be honoured by that body.

"For the past ten years Sir S. Radhakrishnan has been unweary in the service of the motherland. He has interpreted the culture of India to the East and West as few scholars have done so far. As Haskel Lecturer on Comparative Religion at Chicago and Hibbert Lecturer in London, Sir Sarvapalli has been an unrival exponent of India's thought and culture. It is the good fortune of the Benares Hindu University that it has been able to secure the services of this savant.

"Sir Sarvapalli was invited to take the appointment on a handsome salary, but he is prepared to work in an honorary capacity. I am sure the appointment of Sir Sarvapalli will give satisfaction to all those who are interested in the progress of this all-India institution.

"This University, which was founded in 1916 as the first residential and teaching University in India, has had remarkably rapid development. Many a noble spirit has contributed to the building up of this edifice of learning. Our gratitude is due to them all and to the various governments, Ruling Princes, patrons and benefactors of the University who have helped it in its onward march.

It is my fervent prayer that the grace of God by which this University was established, may continue to protect and develop it and make the Benares Hindu University a centre of the highest learning, spiritual as well as secular, for the glory of the motherland and for the glory of God."

MR. BATY ON THE JEWS.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

My letter warmly repudiating any idea that a feeling of hatred for the Jews was imbibed by practically all Christians in their early childhood was most kindly printed by you in your issue for 24th June, and I thank you for your well-known fairness.

But your sense of logic, forgive me for saying, is less apparent. My modest recital of first-hand Christian experience is met by a long ad captandum article by a Jew. And you observe, editorially, that "obviously the Jews are the best fitted to express an opinion."

My submission is that a child brought up as an average Christian knows best what Christian children are taught and how Christian children feel.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

South African Developments :—The South African Assembly accepted this week a resolution moved by General Smuts recommending severance of relations with Germany against one moved by the Prime Minister, General Hertzog, proposing that South Africa's attitude should in effect be one of neutrality. General Hertzog maintained that South Africa's relations with the various belligerents should continue as if no war was being waged, subject to a proviso that the existing relations and obligations between South Africa and Britain and other members of the Commonwealth continue unimpaired. General Hertzog evidently had taken his cue from Eire which has declared its neutrality subject to its obligations to allow Great Britain the use of her ports as naval bases. There is, however, no racial cleavage in Eire as there is in South Africa between Britons and Boers. General Smuts' resolution was adopted by a majority of 80 to 67. About 40 out of 111 supporters in the Assembly of the Government of which both General Hertzog and General Smuts were leading members, should have voted for the neutrality resolution with 27 Nationalists led by Dr. Malan. The Dominion or British party members numbering 8 would naturally vote for General Smut's resolution. The single Socialist member would have done likewise. The division shows that a decisive majority among the supporters of General Hertzog's Government did not agree with his neutrality policy. The Union Parliament has been prorogued till December. The inclusion of Mr. Hofmeyer in General Smut's new Government may be taken to mean that anti-Indian measures will, for the time being, remain in abeyance. Mr. Stuttaford, Minister for the Interior in the late Government who was in charge of the Segregation Bill passed in the last session, is also in the new Cabinet but he has been shifted to the department of Commerce. We trust that before Parliament meets in December the war would have come to an end and that the White leaders of South Africa would have come to realise the value of approaching the problem of the non-White races in the Union in a just and humane spirit.

The Chatfield Report:—An Associated Press message dated Simla the 3rd September assured the public that the Indian Army, both in matter of equipment and training, is an up-to-date force fully prepared to take the field. The next day, the Government of India issued for publication the substance of the main recommendations of the report of a Committee of which Lord Chatfield was Chairman, embodied in a despatch from the British Government. It was prominently stated in the introductory passages that His Majesty's Government had made a free gift of Rs. 33½ crores and a loan of Rs. 11¾ crores to India to bring the equipment and organisation of the defence forces in India into line with modern conditions in the next five years. How is the discrepancy between the first statement that the Indian army is up-to-date in equipment and training and this unprecedented gift of money to be expended in the next five years to modernise it, to be explained? The explanation is that the Indian Army as it is, is different from the Indian Army as the Chatfield Committee would wish it to be. The following paragraph in the despatch makes this plain :

> Hitherto the principle has been accepted that India should be responsible for the "minor danger" of the maintenance of internal security and for the defence of her land frontiers, while Great Britain should be responsible for the "major danger" of an attack by a Great Power upon India, or upon the Empire through India. Modern developments have, however, clearly shown how vulnerable India is to attack in other forms than those that were envisaged, when the principle was first laid down Such attacks, if they should ever mature, would so vitally affect India's own well-being that they would demand her immediate co-operation in effective measures for her defence. In such cases, India's defence would clearly be most effectively and economically assured by co-operation in the defence of points outside India, strategically essential to her security. Thus, the Committee have recommended as a general principle that the forces maintained by India should be adequate not merely for the narrower purposes of purely local defence, but also to assist in maintaining what they describe as "India's external security," and further that India should acknowledge that her responsibility cannot in her own interests be safely limited to the local defence of her land frontiers and coasts.

Natural and Fancy Frontiers :—His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief in India, Sir Robert Cassels, dotted the i's and crossed the t's of this cryptic statement in an address broadcast from Simla on Tuesday evening. He said :—

> Look eastwards, and think what would happen to India, if Malaya and its great fortress of Singapore were to fall into the hands of an enemy. The British Fleet would thereby lose its great base in the east and the whole eastern coastline of India from Calcutta to Madras would become liable to raid and bombardment by sea and air. The loss of Malaya might well also mean a serious threat to Burma. Napoleon once said when he occupied the Low Countries that he had in Antwerp a pistol pointed at the heart of England. Burma, in hostile hands, would be a pistol pointed at the heart of Bengal.
> Look westwards, to the Red Sea and Egypt. So long as Egypt, our ally, is free and independent and able with our help to check the movements of a hostile power, the Indian Ocean and the shores of India are likely to remain immune from attack from that direction. In other words, it may be said that it is vital to the interests of India that Egypt and Aden should never fall into hostile hands. In the conditions of the world situation as it has developed in recent years, the places which I have named have become of the first importance to the defence of India and must be considered to be her outposts. Eastwards we have Signapore, Malaya and Burma. Westwards, Egypt, Aden and the lands of the Persian Gulf. If these were to be lost to India's friends, India would be directly threatened.

This argument was anticipated and answered in the Reformer of July 15 when we recalled Lord Salisbury's advice to Lord Lytton when he was Viceroy of India with reference to the North Western Frontier, warning him that military experts, if they had their way, will not be content until they have extended the frontiers to the moon. The idea of making Egypt on the West and Malaya on the East the frontiers of India in these directions would have found short shrift at the hands of that great statesman. "Modern conditions" which bulk so largely and vaguely in these documents have not rendered useless the great natural defences of India, the triple seas and the loftiest mountain ranges in the world. Indian strategy should be based upon these unique features of Indian geography. In passing we can not help the observation that Indian publicists are gravely handicapped in their examination of the Chatfield scheme by its publication on the morrow of the declaration of war in Europe. India has no quarrel with any nation. She desires, as does, indeed, the British Empire, to live at peace with all the world. It takes two to make a quarrel. India does not want to be one of the two. India is asked to acknowledge that her defence requires her to protect Egypt and Malaya. But before the Indian public knew anything of the scheme, it has been put into force. The monetary gift which goes with the scheme should not blind us to the full implications of it; during the last War India gave thrice as much to Britain. We leave the matter here for the present but obviously it must be reconsidered at the first suitable opportunity.

Gandhiji's Interview with the Viceroy :—The statement issued by Gandhiji on his interview with Lord Linlithgow was a much more qualified one than the summary broadcast from Delhi on Tuesday evening had led one to suppo... The radio message had stated in effect t... Gandhiji had appealed to his countrymen... enter on the war to end Hitlersim. T... would have meant nothing less t... his abandonment of ahimsa. The nea... "What will India's deliverance," ... asks, "be worth if England and France fall, or ... they come out victorious over Germany, ruin... and humbled?" Possibly Gandhiji felt th... peace between these three countries was essen... before there could be peace in Poland as w... As a matter of fact, the position is the revers... and would seriously impair that unity which is the vital need of the hour.

We do not know how far the taluqdars and the Princes whom the Pioneer claims to represent in this article, shares the huckstering attitude of the Pioneer. We would remind the Pioneer that both the Maharaja of Bikanir and the Jamsaheb made it clear that their loyalty was subject to no condition. Likewise Britain may take the loyalty of the taluqdars for granted in the existing conditions. In the face of this, it is ridiculous to make cut, as the Pioneer does, that, if Lord Linlithgow attempts to win Congress cooperation by meeting its objections, he will be faced with the danger of non-cooperation from Indian Princes and taluqdars. This goes farther than the general Indian sentiment that there should be no bargaining. It is advice to the British to persist in their Indian policy. If this is not what the Pioneer means, then the entire article is meaningless. The Pioneer's comment is a timely warning to Indian statesmen of the danger of their being stampeded into accepting otherwise unacceptable political changes under the guise of preserving "national unity."

Sagotra Marriages :—Social legislation, that is legislation affecting family life, was bitterly opposed by the public, including some social reformers. Now social reform legislation has become the fashion. The older reformers while deprecating the opposition, confined their proposals to reforms of customs or practices involving cruelty or physical and moral hardship. Sati, the remarriage of widows, child marriage, were such customs. At present, we think that a law permitting divorce has become a necessity among caste Hindus. There may be no Sanskrit word for divorce as Mr. Aney said the other day in the Legislative Assembly speaking on Dr. Deshmukh's Bill. (The Doctor was prevented from attending to sponsor his Bill by the ban laid by the Working Committee of the Congress on the attendance of Congressmen as a protest against the sending of Indian troops to Egypt and Singapore without the knowledge and consent of the Legislature.) But there are many other things which even the most orthodox Hindu uses nowadays for which there are no words in classical Sanskrit—motor cars, soda water and cigarettes, for instance. That is by the way. Apart from the subjects mentioned above, there are at present no customs which urgently calls for legislative relief. Legislation which is not urgent in social matters may be left over until the need for it has arisen. We can not help thinking that the draft Bill of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association to legalise marriages between persons of the same gotra falls into this category. There is already a law under which a couple belonging to the same gotra may contract a valid marriage in the shape of Gour's Act. According to Hindu ideas the marriage of persons of the same gotra is not far short of incestuous. People who have outgrown this prejudice, which we admit has no rational basis, need not jib at the incidents relating to succession and the joint family which are attached to marriages under the Gour Act. On the other hand, the monogamous principle of the Act is a distinct advantage. In practice, the prohibition of sagotra marriages is not a step comparable to the penalising of child marriage. Except that children of two brothers can not contract a marriage, a bar which is justifiable on eugenic grounds, the present prohibition involves no serious greivance to any one.

Civil Service Reform :—The greatest anomaly of the Indian reforms is that the Indian Civil Service is outside the control of Ministers. In Great Britain the present Government has made a startling departure from tradition by appointing an outsider, Sir Horace Wilson, as Secretary to the Treasury and Head of the Civil Service, and Sir George Gater, Clerk to the London Country Council, as Permanent Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Economist argues in justification of these appointments. It points out that the present system, founded in its modern form by Gladstone, was designed to limit the administration to the execution of principles laid down elsewhere and to watch over the observance of the law. The recruitment and training of the service, it adds, were adjusted to this aim. "Young men were and are recruited direct from the University by an examination in which excellence in any field of study is sufficient; a classical scholar may be posted to the Customs and Excise." The Economist calls this system "the glorification of the amateur," but admits that it has worked admirably and given the country a Civil Service that combines incorruptibility with efficiency, unequalled in any country except Imperial Germany. But the basic principle of administration has changed in Britain. The Civil Servant has now to do many things besides preserving law and order, which require special training. The journal suggests the recruitment of a special branch of the Civil Service with technical qualifications. The Indian Civil Servivice until after the War was recruited on the same lines and indeed through the same examination as the British Service. After the War, the old discarded principle of nomination was introduced to make up for the deficiency in the British personnel. It is too early to judge how far this has been a success. In India as in Britain the Civil Servant has now varied functions and some elasticity should be instituted in the recruitment. At the same time care should be taken to prevent the invasion of political and party influence from creeping into the selecting agency.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, September 9, 1939.

INDIA AND THE WAR.

On Sunday the 3rd September about a quarter after 11 a. m. the British Prime Minister broadcast from the Cabinet Room in 10, Downing Street, that Great Britain was at war with Germany. On the 1st September German troops had invaded Polish territory. Signor Mussolini intervened and offered to mediate between Germany and Poland and her allies. He suggested that hostilities should cease and a Conference of five Powers, Germany, Poland, Italy, France and Great Britain should be called to devise a satisfactory settlement of the dispute regarding Danzig and the Polish Corridor. France was said to have accepted the offer and the British Government insisted that German troops should be withdrawn before there was any talk of a settlement. The British Ambassador in Berlin was instructed to inform the German Government that, if this was not done, Britain would consider that her guarantee to Poland to go to her assistance in case of invasion by Germany, must take effect. Time was given until 11 o'clock on the morning of Sunday the 3rd for the German reply. Herr Hitler did not send a reply but in his address that same evening to a special session of the Reichstag he declared that he would give no undertaking to the British Government. On the non-receipt of an answer by the stipulated hour, the British Prime Minister announced that a state of war existed between Great Britain and Germany. A few hours later the French Prime Minister made a similar announcement in the French Parliament. The British Prime Minister speaking at a special session of the House of Commons the same evening, concluded on a personal note. He said :

> It is a sad day for all of us, but for none is it sadder than for me. Everything I have done, worked for, hoped for and believed in during my public life has crashed in ruins. The only thing left to me is to devote what powers I have for victory. I can not tell what part I may be allowed to play, but I trust I will live to see the day when Hitlerism is destroyed (loud cheers) and a restored and liberated Europe has been re-established (loud cheers).

An hour or two after the Prime Minister addressed the House of Commons, the Viceroy broadcast an appeal to the people of India from Simla. His Excellency had to base his appeal on some ground which would strike a responsive chord in Indian hearts. Danzig and the Polish Corridor was not such a ground. Indian sympathy was keener in the cases of Abyssinia, China and Czecho-Slovakia and British intervention in their favour would have evoked much enthusiasm. The fact that over 90 per cent of the population of Danzig was German, sharply distinguished its case from the rest. Those who have studied the history of the Corridor, are inclined to think that both Germany and Poland have an equal interest in it. Even the British and French Governments did not reject the German claim out of hand. They only maintained that the question should be settled by peaceful negotiation and that it was capable of being settled by such means. The appeal on the ground of danger to democracy was not suitable as Poland was not a democracy nor has it evinced aspirations towards democracy. Nor is India, though it aspires to one. Mr. Neville Chamberlain could speak of a liberated Europe as the supreme end of his but India can not be called upon to liberate Europe. During all these months of feverish anxiety Indian people has not been kept informed of their point of view has been completely ignored. His Excellency, therefore, enlarged on the danger to world peace and progress, of system which seeks to solve international differences by force instead of by reason, and added :

> Nowhere do these great principles mean more than in India. There is no country that values them more highly than India and none that has at all times been more concerned to safeguard them.

Later the same night His Majesty the King broadcast to the Empire a short address uttered in a faltering voice which plainly showed the strain of a great emotional experience.

Japan has declared her intention not to get mixed up in the European trouble. She has formally conveyed to the British Government her resolve to remain neutral. Italy also has done the same. The Rome-Berlin Pact recently concluded was more than once declared by both Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini to be designed to knit the two peoples together in peace and war for all time. Italy's announcement of neutrality was, therefore, a surprise. But, so far as India is concerned, the neutrality of Japan and Italy removes, at any rate for the time being, the chances of aggression from the two most likely quarters. For this relief the country should be grateful to Providence. India renounced force as a means of advancing national interests centuries ago, but poverty, her subjection to foreign rule, and her elimination from international councils, have made many of her intelligentsia wonder if it was wise to do so. The espousal of the doctrine of non-aggression by Western nations will help to rehabilitate the faith of the people in their national heritage. Therefore, the struggle that is now being waged in Europe to oust force and instal reason as the principal instrument for regulating human relations, will appeal to the people of India as one between the powers of Light and Darkness. It is to be hoped that not only Germany but all European nations in their relations not only with each other but also with peoples of other continents, will determine henceforth to be guided solely by reason and renounce forever the use of force to gain or retain ascendancy over each other. Otherwise the fruit of the present struggle would be as bitter as that of the last War.

and would seriously impair that unity which is the vital need of the hour.

Legislation which is not urgent in social matters may be left over until the need for it has arisen. We can not help thinking that the draft Bill of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association to legalise marriages between persons of the same gotra falls into this category. There is already a law under which a couple belonging to the same gotra may contract a valid marriage in the shape of Gour's Act. According to Hindu ideas the marriage of persons of the same gotra is not far short of incestuous. People who have outgrown this prejudice, which we admit has no rational basis, need not jib at the incidents relating to succession and the joint family which are attached to marriages under the Gour Act. On the other hand, the monogamous principle of the Act is a distinct advantage. In practice, the prohibition of sagotra marriages is not a step comparable to the penalising of child marriage. Except that children of two brothers can not contract a marriage, a bar which is justifiable on eugenic grounds, the present prohibition involves no serious greivance to any one.

Civil Service Reform :—The greatest anomaly of the Indian reforms is that the Indian Civil Service is outside the control of Ministers. In Great Britain the present Government has made a startling departure from tradition by appointing an outsider, Sir Horace Wilson, as Secretary to the Treasury and Head of the Civil Service, and Sir George Gater, Clerk to the London Country Council, as Permanent Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Economist argues in justification of these appointments. It points out that the present system, founded in its modern form by Gladstone, was designed to limit the administration to the execution of principles laid down elsewhere and to watch over the observance of the law. The recruitment and training of the service, it adds, were adjusted to this aim. "Young men were and are recruited direct from the University by an examination in which excellence in any field of study is sufficient; a classical scholar may be posted to the Customs and Excise." The Economist calls this system "the glorification of the amateur," but admits that it has worked admirably and given the country a Civil Service that combines incorruptibility with efficiency, unequalled in any country except Imperial Germany. But the basic principle of administration has changed in Britain. The Civil Servant has now to do many things besides preserving law and order, which require special training. The journal suggests the recruitment of a special branch of the Civil Service with technical qualifications. The Indian Civil Servivice until after the War was recruited on the same lines and indeed through the same examination as the British Service. After the War, the old discarded principle of nomination was introduced to make up for the deficiency in the British personnel. It is too early to judge how far this has been a success. In India as in Britain the Civil Servant has now varied functions and some elasticity should be instituted in the recruitment. At the same time care should be taken to prevent the invasion of political and party influence from creeping into the selecting agency.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, September 9, 1939.

INDIA AND THE WAR.

On Sunday the 3rd September about a quarter after 11 a. m. the British Prime Minister broadcast from the Cabinet Room in 10, Downing Street, that Great Britain was at war with Germany. On the 1st September German troops had invaded Polish territory. Signor Mussolini intervened and offered to mediate between Germany and Poland and her allies. He suggested that hostilities should cease and a Conference of five Powers, Germany, Poland, Italy, France and Great Britain should be called to devise a satisfactory settlement of the dispute regarding Danzig and the Polish Corridor. France was said to have accepted the offer and the British Government insisted that German troops should be withdrawn before there was any talk of a settlement. The British Ambassador in Berlin was instructed to inform the German Government that, if this was not done, Britain would consider that her guarantee to Poland to go to her assistance in case of invasion by Germany, must take effect. Time was given until 11 o'clock on the morning of Sunday the 3rd for the German reply. Herr Hitler did not send a reply but in his address that same evening to a special session of the Reichstag he declared that he would give no undertaking to the British Government. On the non-receipt of an answer by the stipulated hour, the British Prime Minister announced that a state of war existed between Great Britain and Germany. A few hours later the French Prime Minister made a similar announcement in the French Parliament. The British Prime Minister speaking at a special session of the House of Commons the same evening, concluded on a personal note. He said :

> It is a sad day for all of us, but for none is it sadder than for me. Everything I have done, worked for, hoped for and believed in during my public life has crashed in ruins. The only thing left to me is to devote what powers I have for victory. I can not tell what part I may be allowed to play, but I trust I will live to see the day when Hitlerism is destroyed (loud cheers) and a restored and liberated Europe has been re-established (loud cheers).

An hour or two after the Prime Minister addressed the House of Commons, the Viceroy broadcast an appeal to the people of India from Simla. His Excellency had to base his appeal on some ground which would strike a responsive chord in Indian hearts. Danzig and the Polish Corridor was not such a ground. Indian sympathy was keener in the cases of Abyssinia, China and Czecho-Slovakia and British intervention in their favour would have evoked much enthusiasm. The fact that over 90 per cent of the population of Danzig was German, sharply distinguished its case from the rest. Those who have studied the history of the Corridor, are inclined to think that both Germany and Poland have an equal interest in it. Even the British and French Governments did not reject the German claim out of hand. They only maintained that the question should be settled by peaceful negotiation and that it was capable of being settled by such means. The appeal on the ground of danger to democracy was not suitable as Poland was not a democracy nor has it evinced aspirations towards democracy. Nor is India, though it aspires to be one. Mr. Neville Chamberlain could speak of a liberated Europe as the supreme end of his war but India can not be called upon to liberate Europe. During all these months of feverish anxiety the Indian people has not been kept informed and their point of view has been completely ignored. His Excellency, therefore, enlarged on the danger to world peace and progress, of the system which seeks to solve international differences by force instead of by reason, and added :

> Nowhere do these great principles mean more than in India. There is no country that values them more highly than India and none that has at all times been more concerned to safeguard them.

Later the same night His Majesty the King broadcast to the Empire a short address uttered in a faltering voice which plainly showed the strain of a great emotional experience.

Japan has declared her intention not to get mixed up in the European trouble. She has formally conveyed to the British Government her resolve to remain neutral. Italy also has done the same. The Rome-Berlin Pact recently concluded was more than once declared by both Herr Hitler and Signor Mussolini as designed to knit the two peoples together in peace and war for all time. Italy's announcement of neutrality was, therefore, a surprise. But, so far as India is concerned, the neutrality of Japan and Italy removes, at any rate for the time being, the chances of aggression from the two most likely quarters. For this relief the country should be grateful to Providence. India renounced force as a means of advancing national interests centuries ago. Her poverty, her subjection to foreign rule, and her elimination from international councils, have made many of her intelligentsia wonder if she was wise to do so. The espousal of the doctrine of non-aggression by Western nations will help to rehabilitate the faith of the people in their national heritage. Therefore, the struggle that is now being waged in Europe to oust force and instal reason as the principal instrument for regulating human relations, will appeal to the people of India as one between the powers of Light and Darkness. It is to be hoped that not only Germany but all European nations in their relations not only with each other but also with peoples of other continents, will determine henceforth to be guided solely by reason and renounce forever the use of force to gain and retain ascendancy over each other. Otherwise the fruit of the present struggle would be as bitter as that of the last War. Nations which four are spent in technical instruction and two in manual labour, until after a year they go on full time. While a trade is being learnt the State grants a living subsidy of 120 rubles a month. The vast majority of young people remain at home during their training, and in these circumstances the allowance is sufficient not only for their upkeep, but for clothes and pocket money. Boys and girls deciding to adopt a profession or artistic career enter a university or special training-school, and while qualifying receive the subsidy for eight or ten years, according to the period of training. All education is free and in every primary school a foreign language is compulsory. At the moment English is the most popular. You find it spoken in most unexpected places.

The actual home conditions lag behind the educational standard. Moscow is being rebuilt at a prodigious rate and some of the worst slums have been torn down. Those remaining are on a par with the fetid quarters of Southwark and Soho—low ceilings, bad sanitation, insufficient water. The newest flats have every modern convenience—gas-stove gayser, even a refrigerator. These, however, are at a premium and generally fall to the star workers of the big plants. Rent average 4·3 per cent. of the united income of the family, with an additional 25 per cent for the latest amenities. It will be, I should say, ten years before the housing demand in Moscow alone is in any sense satisfied. The leeway to be made up is prodigious.

The standard of comfort domestically speaking is not high. The food problem, it is true, no longer exists. There are lavish supplies of every kind of provisions; I have never seen a people eat so much or so often. But there is a scarcity of utensils and material. Linen and cotton goods fall very short of the demand, and every second building screams for paint inside and out.

The reason for this lack of commodies is an actual shortage of labour. There is a gigantic demand for man and woman power which leaves unsatisfied all but the major requisities of transport, food, hospitals schools, juvenile camps and Government building. The housing problem for the present has had to go owing to the rearmament programme and the increase in military demands.

CONGRESS EDUCATIONAL REFORM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

On reading the following caricature of the Congress educational policy, I was reminded of a former occasion when you said the violence of the tongue cuts far more than that of the sword. In the last number of The Reformer you almost go out of your way and remark, "Even if all the reforms of the educational system projected under Congress auspices are immediately introduced, it will take at least a generation to reduce the general intelligence level to that of the average kisan who has no use for (?) freedom of speech or writing and who is only too glad (?) to let others think for him."

This is really caricaturing the true position: I may be allowed to say, even a wilful perversion, unless passion overtook reason. A still more perverse remark was when, in an earlier number, you hinted whether a Wardha School near Bandra should take to the slaughter-house as its basic craft.

Now, Sir, you cannot surely miss the point of the reforms contemplated. And you so strongly express your opposition to that, that none can mistake that too. My only submission to you is, whether the above remarks are a proper way of ventilating your opposition. Politicians in opposite camps are found revelling in such perversions. You are not of that band. Rather, the other day you criticized Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel by remarking that "He has rather got into the habit of provoking needless antagonism even amongst friends by being aggressively and obtrusively outspoken." Reformer August 26th. Are you not in the same error, granting that what you so bluntly and offensively call a "spade" is a spade regarding the educational reforms contemplated by the Congress? I may only end by saying, "A thing is easily said than done; physician, heal thyself."

[We gladly publish this letter and we appreciate the friendly spirit in which it is written. Our correspondent rightly points out that we have often deprecated the use of violent language. We have occasionally used strong language but never violent language which is a very different thing. Our criticisms as a rule are directed to measures not to men. Often it might have been noticed The Reformer does not even mention the names of the authors of the measures which it criticises. As regards the sentence in our article which, we are sorry, has hurt our correspondent, the article dealt with a rule of the Madras Government which impinged seriously on citizen rights of teacher; and it was relevant to point out that the educational policy of the Congress, whatever other advantages it might confer, tended to the regimentation of teachers, curricula and even text-books, and can only have the effect of making teachers and students alike as indifferent to liberty of speech and opinion as peasants; who have no opinions, and need for freedom to express them, on affairs which do not concern their crops and cattle—Ed., *I. SAGOTRA MARRIAGES.

[The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association has drafted the following Bill to validate Sagolia and Sapravara marriages among Hindus.]

Whereas it is expedient to remove interdictions relating to marriages between parties belonging to the same Gotra or Pravara and to validate such marriages; It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. (a) This Act may be called the Bombay Hindu Marriage Validating Act, 193.

(b) It extends to the whole of the Province of of Bombay.

(c) It shall come into force on such date as it receives the assent of the Governor.

2. Notwithstanding any text of Hindu law or custom or usage to the contrary, a marriage between Hindus shall not be invalid by reason only of the fact that parties thereto have the same Gotra or Pravara.

3. Section 2 shall have retrospective effect.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

It is no doubt true that under the Hindu Law, marriages between members of the same Gotra or Pravara have been regarded as null and void. It might be that in the most ancient times the membership of the Gotra was confined to a small group living close together and connected by actual ties of blood. The times have changed considerably since then and at present it is impossible to trace the reason on which this prohibition came to be based. Research during recent years has shown that neither the Gotra

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

nor the Pravara is indicative of the ancestry of a person. It is further to be noted that orig inlly only the Brahmins had the Gotra and the Kshatriyas used to adopt as their own the Gotra of their priest or purohit. In this respect Sir P. S. Sivaswamy Aiyer observes: "The interdiction of marriage between Sagotras can only be regarded as a surviving taboo, based upon no reason or reason which has long since disappeared. This interdiction is a needless and vexatious interference with personal liberty, and circumscribes the choice of a bride or bridegroom."

In recent years attempts have been made to circumvent this prohibition by giving the bride in adoption into another Gotra. It will have to be conceded that an adoption of a girl is opposed to the very principle of the institution of adoption and it would be a debatable question whether the giving of the girl in adoption before marriage would ensure the validity of a marriage, if tested in a Court of law.

In the Baroda State, the Government, after considering the opinions of medical men and other experts, has removed this restriction. This action has not caused any social resentment in Baroda. Even in the Province ef Bombay opinion is gaining ground that this restriction ought to go. The removal of this restriction would cause no grievance or inconveniene. This legislation should have retrospective effect so that the validity of marriages resorted to in violation of this restriction with the help of adoption, etc., should be placed beyond doubt or question.

This Bill is not intended to affect in any way the rule of prohibition based on the Sapinda relationship between the parties to a marriage.

NOTES.

The Late L. R. Tairsee :—We deeply regret the death of Lakhmidas Rowji Tairsee at the comparatively early age of 63. He had a robust-seeming constitution which, it is obvious, reflected more the indomitable spirit of the man than his physical make-up. The quality in him which was most conspicuous was that he was absolutely incapable of intrigue. It was impossible to associate Tairsee with anything underhand. A man of strong convictions he stood by them through fair weather and foul. A social reformer to the core of his being, and extremely outspoken on the sins of his people, he was also foremost in organising relief whenever they were overtaken by calamity, famine, plague or the influenza epidemic of 1918, which took a fearful toll of lives in this city. He was the moving spirit of the Hindu Gymkhana and fought for its rights with grim determination which earned the respect even of his opponents. Another subject which enlisted his sympathy and strenuous support was the hardships of third class railway passengers. In the Bombay Municipal Corporation he was a sturdy fighter in the cause of the neglected and the helpless. He had a warm heart but there was nothing sentimental about him. He was one of the most active members of the Bombay Municipal Corporation for many years. But he was never elected its President because the art of electioneering was not in his line. Tairsee was no respecter of persons ; prince or pauper was the same to him. The extreme position which he took up against the Prohibition measures of the Bombay Government, was characteristic of the man. He never did anything by halves. It was always neck or nothing with him. About a month ago a postcard in his own hand was received here saying that he was in a nursing home. It was not suspected that there was anything serious the matter with him. We did not see much of Tairsee of late years. But occasionally there would come from him a word of cheer when something in the Reformer struck him as particularly sound. His was a unique personality. Our deepest sympathies are with his family.

Political Cross-Currents :—The mass meeting held this week in Calcutta to denounce the Communal Award, was presided over by Mr. M. S. Aney of the Democratic Swaraj Party of the Congress, and among the speakers were Sir Manmathnath Mukherjee, late Judge of the Calcutta High Court and Sir Nripendranath Sircar who retired from the Law Membership of the Government of India a few months back. Sir Nripendra was a member of the Round Table Conference and spoke from inside knowledge. He had revealed on another occasion recently that while the present Secretary of State, Lord Zetland, and eight other members of Parliament, supported in the Joint Parliamentary Committee, a modification of the Communal Award so as to bear less inequitably on the Hindus of Bengal, they got no support from Congress Hindus and were opposed by Muslims. The impression is gaining ground that Congress leaders are intent on consolidating their party position with scant regard for principles generally associated with democracy. Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel who presided over the Prime Ministers Conference spoke at a reception given to the members in Poona. Incidentally he touched on the question of a successor to Gandhiji. Just as Gandhiji was available to step into the shoes of Lokamanya Tilak when the latter expired at the crucial moment when the question of non-co-operation hung in the balance, so, said the Sardar, some one will be ready to ascend the Gandhian gadi at the proper time. If it was meant that Gandhiji on Mr. Tilak's demise, took up the threads of policy where the latter left them, it is a mistake. Tilak was dead against non-co-operation which he characterized as political lunacy. Likewise Gandhiji's successor will no doubt discard some of his predecessor's cherished items, such as khadi, as having fulfilled their purpose. Truth and non-violence are primary duties of civilised men and have no special application to politicians as such. The old Congress leaders were not liars and roughs. Thus a new era will open with perhaps Mr. Subhas Bose or Dr. Savarkar as leaders. The leadership of the next generation of Indian politics will go either to

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Bengal or to the South. An ex-President of the Congress, Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, has just resigned his four anna membership of the Congress and his ex-officio membership of the controlling Committees, on the ground that he can serve the Congress and the country better from outside than from within. The statement he has issued is a vigorous indictment of the policy of the present Congress leaders, which can not be ignored. After all, you cannot run the government of a sub-continent without carrying the intelligentsia with you. Even if all the reforms of the Educational system projected under Congress auspices are immediately introduced, it will take at least a generation to reduce the general intelligence level to that of the average kisan who has no use for freedom of speech or writing and who is only too glad to let others think for him.

The High Court on the Press Ban:—The Bombay High Court (Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Sen) have declared that the order served on five newspapers on the 1st August by the Chief Presidency Magistrate was illegal and void. Two of the five papers had applied to the Court for the cancellation of the order. One of them was the Jame-Jamshed, a daily paper of high standing, which during its career extending over one hundred years, has never transgressed the limits of legitimate journalism. The other was a weekly journal. The three other victims of the order did not appeal. Perhaps they shared the general feeling that newspapers were helpless against executive action. Perhaps they did not care to lose money in trying for the repeal of an order which was withdrawn a week after it was promulgated. However that may be, the Jame-Jamshed has rendered a signal service to the cause of Indian journalism by taking the matter to the High Court for adjudication. There is evidently something radically wrong in a state of things which put it in the power of a small man with a brief authority to besmirch a reputation built up by three generations of honourable journalism by a stroke of the pen. The Chief Justice held that the Court had power to pass judgment on the order even though it was no longer in force. Convictions of persons who had served the full term of their sentences have, his lordship pointed out, been set aside on appeal. The order of the Chief Presidency Magistrate, in his lordship's judgment, was bad as it failed to comply with the essential requirements of Section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code under which it purported to be issued. The Magistrate had no right to delegate a power vested in him to the Public Relations Officer. His lordship made some caustic remarks about this officer's conception of his duty, which impelled him to send "orders" to the Chief Justice and other Judges of the High Court to attend and take part in the pro-Prohibition demonstrations of August 1st. His lordship described the duties of this official as laid down in the Government resolution creating the appointment, as being "to advertise the benevolent activities of Government." Although the Chief Presidency Magistrate and the Public Relations Officer figured in the judgment the main responsibility for the error of law and judgment exposed by the Chief Justice, lies with the Government and the Home Minister.

Congress Prime Ministers' Conference:—The proceedings of the Conference held in Poona last week, of the Prime Ministers of the Provinces under Congress-controlled Governments, were, as usual nowadays, wrapped in mystery. But the holding of the Conference itself shows that one of the first things which the Congress Party will do whenever it takes office at the centre, is to centralize the administration of the whole country and, as a measure necessary for that purpose, restore the unitary administration of the British Provinces. Linguistic provinces will be allowed much autonomy but by devolution. The strong tendency of the Congress in its internal working is towards centralization and that tendency will find full expression when Congress gets control of the centre. That it will do so at no distant date, is more than a probability. The only question is whether it will be able to form an exclusively party Government or whether it will do so in coalition with the Princes and the Muslim League. How long it will be able to retain power, is another question. The Prime Minister of Madras, Mr. Rajagopalacharya, who attended the Conference at Poona, speaking at a meeting of South Indians resident in that city, said that though he was the most hated man in the province and although his opponents represented several interests, there was no other party in sight which could compete for power with the Congress. This is true not only of Madras but also of the country generally. During recent years the Congress has monopolised political life in the country. Except for the Muslim League which, as a communal party, counts for little outside the predominantly Muslim provinces, the Congress has been having its own way. The prevailing discontent, wide and deep as it is, with some of its measures, has so far not taken definite shape in a single party. But signs are not wanting that things are tending that way. The formation of branches of the Hindu Mahasabha in Madras and Bengal, which have hitherto held aloof from the movement, is significant. Of special significance is the election in Madras of Dr. Varadarajulu Naidu as President, and Mr. M. C. Raja and Mr. K. S. Ramaswami Sastry as Vice-presidents. The closing of the Brahmin-non-Brahmin schism and the recognition of the antyajas as integral elements of Hindu society, in the executive control of the Madras branch, are hopeful features.

Princes' Protest:—The Maharajahs of Bikaner and Nawanagar have come forward to protest that the rulers of Indian States are utterly disinterested in their devotion to the British Raj. They have seized upon the suggestion of the

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Simla correspondent of Times of India that the Princes might take advantage of the difficulties of the Government on account of the international situation to raise the terms on which they would join the Federation. The journalist who conveyed the suggestion, must be singularly out of touch with the course of events. The Princes have been haggling with Government for the last two years. Their demands reached the climax about the time when Mr. Chamberlain returned from Munich in the belief that he had secured peace for our time. Ever since they passed the Bombay resolution some months ago declaring the draft Instrument of Accession to be unacceptable, some of them have been repenting of it and taking every opportunity to disclaim that the resolution meant rejection of Federation and all that was intended was that they should be given more time to make up their minds. This the Viceroy has graciously conceded. His Excellency has also announced the creation of a Crown Police under his direct control for discharging the obligations of the Paramount Power to the States. So far as the Government of India are concerned, the Berlin-Moscow Pact has certainly not aggravated their difficulties in British India. It has rather relieved them to some extent. The immediate effect of the Pact was to break the Berlin-Rome-Tokio Axis at the Asiatic end. There is little danger now from Japan. Great Britain and France with such assistance as Egypt can furnish, should be able to check any aggressive designs that the two European Axis Powers may have on British and French possessions in Asia and Africa. For the Princes to try to put pressure on Government now, would inevitably precipitate a Federation of British India alone and its constitution as the representative of the Crown in relation to the States. The Crown has a perfect right to delegate its authority to the Government of British India as at present. The Princes as loyal allies will, of course, accept the Suzerain's decision. This is indeed one of the demands of British Indian politicians who fear that the dual position of the Governor-General as constitutional head of a responsible Government and Crown Representative responsible only to the Sovereign, may lead to frequent deadlocks. The consolidation of British India and the delegation to it of the rights reserved for the Crown in the Government of India Act, will, at once transform the relations between India and Britain into one of cordial understanding instead of mutual distrust.

Sir S. Radhakrishnan:—The news published this week that Sir Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan has been selected by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya to succeed him as Vice-Chancellor of the Benares Hindu University, would have given universal satisfaction. Panditjee has had the rare privilege of guiding the University which is his own creation all these years. He has struggled on bravely with his onerous task in the face of several other preoccupations and never very robust health. During the last few years, the burden must have strained his failing strength to breaking point. He has all along kept an eye on the intellectual horizon with a view to fix upon a worthy successor to himself. In Sir Radhakrishnan he has found the ideal man for the position. Sir Sarvapalli has had a large hand in moulding modern Hindu thought. His presentation of it has not only helped foreign countries to understand Indian civilisation and culture but has also helped his own people to do so. His great achievement and his international reputation will be valuable acquisitions to the University. The one omission in Pandit Malaviya's distinguished regime was that not enough scope was allowed for the world influence which Hindu thought has been acquiring in recent years. This will be amply supplied under Sir Sarvapalli's guidance. We wish the new Vice-Chancellor a long and successful term in his new office.

Between War and Peace:—In the House of Commons on Tuesday Mr. Chamberlain gave a meagre account of the negotiations between himself and Herr Hitler. It seems to show that the British Premier has control of the situation. His unwonted confidence might possibly be due to an appreciation of Britain's preparedness. But it is to a great extent due to the obvious fact that Herr Hitler appears less formidable. The signing of the pact with Russia has, it would seem, taken away several inches from the stature of the Nazi leader—at any rate so far as Mr. Chamberlain is concerned. Herr Hitler having abandoned the role of leading champion against Bolshevism, the scales seem to have dropped from Mr. Chamberlain's eyes. Not only has the hero dwindled but he is seen in association with the villain of the piece. This psychological change is likely to be the deciding factor in the crisis. Mr. Chamberlain is now pursuing with commendable vigour a policy urged on him for the past one year. His appeals to Herr Hitler are coupled with firm emphasis on his intention to stand by Poland. If Mr. Chamberlain has lost a valuable year there is this consolation: But for the German policy adopted after Munich of smashing the Czechoslovak State ruthlessly the Polish contention that the demands for Danzig are only the first step against the independence of Poland would not be believed. As we go to press news comes through that Germany has offered peace terms directly to Poland. The immediate return of Danzig, the settlement of the Corridor question by a plebiscite of all those born or resident there since 1918, the right to construct a motor road and a rail road across the Corridor, are the broad outlines of the German plan. A five power commission of Russia, Britain, France, Germany and Italy is suggested to settle details. Earlier reports announced that the offer of the Queen of Holland and the King of Belgium to mediate between Poland and Germany was favourably received by all the nations, and that His Holiness the Pope had sent forth another peace appeal.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, September 2, 1939.

INDIA AND THE WAR THREAT.

In the discussions that are taking place in India about the threatened war in Europe, one thing is significant. Nobody, except Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, Premier of the Punjab, argues that India should support Britain because of the advantages she will receive from a grateful government. After the last War and the post-war years, no one can nurse the illusion that any country can escape the brutalising influences of a war. And one may be sure that it will take even longer for the nations to recover from the effects of the next war. Every Indian accepts, we believe, that the very fact of a war will be a setback to national progress in India as in every other country, directly or indirectly involved. "The growth of autocratic rule has been associated with an increased interest in material welfare, a desire for a larger share of the world's goods both between the different elements in the population, and as against other people," writes Dr. A. Lawrence Lowell in an article on democracy; and "something of the kind has been observed after every great war." (Foreign Affairs.)

The Working Committee of the Indian National Congress at its last meeting passed a resolution defining its attitude towards the next war. The resolution contained two parts, one expressing "ideological" sympathy with all victims of aggression and the other declaring its opposition to India's being thrown into a war without her consent. This is an extremely difficult attitude to maintain. Until an actual war is started, Congress leaders will be giving full effect to the first part of the resolution. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru who, as Gandhiji has since revealed, is responsible for the Congress resolution on War, provides an interesting illustration of its defects. Pandit Nehru denied that he was going to China as an "ambassador" of the Congress; but in the same statement he claimed to be visiting China on a mission of good will from India, which is a much bigger thing—today. Gandhiji himself has sent a message of sympathy to Poland. How can India, after all these "goodwill" missions and messages, refuse to assist Britain in a war waged to relieve the victims of aggression of their suffering? How can other Indians be restrained from carrying the "mission" a step further in the event of general war? Those Congress leaders who are now stirring up the country into an excitement against Fascism, Nazism and aggression against China, will have, if war breaks out, to pull in the opposite direction. Now they are playing the part of Churchill; then they must become all Chamberlains. We should have much preferred that Congressmen stood by the main part of their resolution, the refusal to press India into a war, about which she is not consulted, in which she has no quarrel and for the prosecution of which she is totally unprepared even for a defensive role. If they did so, they would naturally refuse all invitations from countries engaged in conflicts abroad; they would refrain from giving others the impression that they had any voice in deciding India's attitude in any war. After all, that is the real position. If Britain decides to fight tomorrow on any issue, India will not be safe from either warring parties. Our troops will be sent out to maintain, as the Spectator desires, the White man's prestige in the East or Britain's place in the West; and our country will be open to the bombing planes of the enemy. We can at the most make Britain's position uncomfortable. To pretend that things are different might be flattering but it would be wide off the mark, and there is the grave danger of misleading third parties.

The national newspapers are loud in urging Mr. Chamberlain to fight Germany whilst supporting the Congress decision to abstain from helping Britain. The British press and British journalists who in the face of impending danger have surrendered their individual judgments to Mr. Chamberlain, support the general Indian demand for greater consultation on the part of the Government of India but at the same time rebuke Congressmen for their indifference. The attitude of the Government is paternal. They do not wish to tell the people what is going on and they assume full responsibility for the defence of the country and its people. Without a definite lead from the Government, nothing but apathy can be expected. This is true of all countries. The duty of Indian publicists, so far as the Government can conceive it, seems to be to tell the public to fight when war is ahead and to pipe down when a pact of concession is signed. Such an attitude creates neither a feeling of security among the people nor a sense of responsibility among the leaders. In several of the Indian princes, the Government of India, it is true, finds the desired response. Some of the Princes have made it plain that they are more concerned about whom they are fighting with, than about what they are fighting for. Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan urges support to Britain on the Muslims of the Punjab and the martial races, not so much because he approves of British policy, nor because he favours unthinking support to Britain, but because he dreads the advent of the Nazi concentration camp which strikes him as the alternative. Even on this ground the Muslim League resents his attitude and a resolution dissociating Indian Muslims from his pronouncement and awaiting the lead of Islamic countries was adopted at Delhi this week. The one inference to be drawn from all this, seems to us to be, that but for the Paramountcy of the British Power—after the introduction of provincial autonomy it is possible to apply the word to both the States and to British India—India would be unaffected by a war in Europe. There would be few publicists urging Indian intervention in an ideological struggle in Europe. The logical attitude for those of the "independence" school of thought should, therefore, be to press for Indian neutrality. One can in the circumstances regard the rather inconsistent thesis that a free India would be with Britain in a war against dictatorship, as a piece of special pleading. We must remember Western Europe's sublime indifference to what happened in Abyssinia or in China or even in Czechoslovakia, Spain, Albania. Even in the United States President Roosevelt is faced with great opposition in his interventionist policy. The Indian politician is no more an altruist than his counterpart elsewhere. If India's sympathies are with Britain today, it is because she is a part of the British Empire, not, as it is often said, in spite of it.

If on general terms that is the reality, the present war crisis is even more puzzling. It is a complete answer to those who urge a war on ideological grounds. Britain, herself a democracy, refused a war for the preservation of the only Central European democracy last September, only to be driven on the brink of one this year in defence of autocratic Poland. Britain after helping Germany to incorporate into the Reich territories with a Czech majority, on grounds of "self determination," now resists Danzig's union with Germany though Danzig has a 96 per cent German majority. This is ununderstandable to ordinary minds, the more so if one remembers that the Sudetenlands were claimed to be, and have been after Munich proved to be, as essential for the existence of the Czechoslovak State as Danzig is for the existence of Poland. We must accept the explanation that self-preservation inspired both the Munich submission and the Danzig resistance. Britain, we are told repeatedly, was not in a position to resist German demands last September. Today the forces ranged against Herr Hitler are stronger. Even after the alienation of Soviet Russia? Even so, that is a poor reason for War. No man in his senses fights merely because he is strong enough or ready enough for a scrap. When the Anglo-Indian Press, presumably referring to Indian national demand for supporting Czechoslovakia against Germany, mildly rebukes Indians for advocating "impracticable" policies, one can only infer that it has very practical reasons for assuming that the Polish dictatorship is more worthy of British support than the Czech democracy was; that German-occupied Danzig is better defendable than the Czech fortifications; and that Britain which was not called upon to play the part of "world policeman" last September, must now fulfil just that responsibility. Those reasons can only be that Danzig and Poland are believed to be the last opportunities for Britain to resist German aggression and to maintain her position as a Great Power. If that is so, they are very good reasons for Britons to support any war that Mr. Chamberlain may be forced into. What Indians complain is that the Government of India has taken no steps to convince them that the argument holds valid for Indians as well. The sole argument so far advanced by the highest British politician as well as by the humblest apologist for Britain, that the Nazi concentration camp is a very unpleasant institution and that Hitler in "Mein Kamp" referred to non-Europeans as half-apes, is the feeblest of all rallying cries. We do not suggest for a moment that by calling Gandhiji and a few leaders tomorrow the Viceroy will remove the basic grievances of Indians. There would be no consultation about such a step now. Such an association of Indians with the Government would be a farce and those who are making it a condition of co-operation, might save time if they co-operated straight off. They would also be acting with greater dignity. Had Indian politicians made a determined protest after the Munich crisis against Britain's ignoring Indian opinion, there might have been no repetition of it this year.

TEACHERS AND PARTY POLITICS.

The Hon. Mr. C. J. Varkey, Education Minister of Madras, speaking at a meeting of school members at Ambasamudram last week, dealt with the objections raised to the extension to teachers in aided schools of the rule against teachers in Government and Municipal schools taking active part in politics. Teachers in Government and Municipal institutions come under the general rule debarring salaried servants of the Crown from standing as candidates for election by popular constituencies. Teachers in aided schools are not salaried servants of the State any more than workers in the All-India Spinners' Association, the Harijan Sevak Sangh, and the All-India Village Industries Association, all of which are in receipt of subventions from provincial governments. Governments in India and, we daresay elsewhere also, have not hesitated to use grants to educational institutions as a means of control over them. In one case some years ago a young and enthusiastic American Professor who did not discreetly veil his sympathy with Indian national aspirations, had to be dismissed as the College, in which he served, was threatened with the deprivation of the Government grant if he was not sent away. The rule of abstinence from politics in practice has a tendency to operate as a rule compelling activity in pro-Government politics. A teacher may indulge in fulsome encomiums of the most silly actions of the powers-that-be, but the rule does not come in his way. Mr. Sastry in his long experience as a teacher must have come across many instances of the actual working of the rule which looks quite proper on paper. His apprehension that it will operate in the same one-sided way under popular Governments, has obliged him to plead for the class of which he was once himself a very distinguished member and which, to his infinite regret and mortification is inwilling or unable to plead its own cause.

Mr. Varkey's argument may be briefly summarised. Politics nowadays is a party game. Unlike other games in which there are strict rules and umpires to enforce them on the spot, there are neither rules nor umpires to regulate the political game. "Everything is fair in love, war—and politics," has passed into a proverb. In love there may be another fellow round the corner to dispute the lady's hand with a stout stick. In war, the enemy will enforce his point of view with the same instruments, human and material, as yourself. In politics alone there are no risks to face. On the other hand, by joining a political party you can minimise even the risk of losing your deposit. The temptation to attach yourself to a political party is great. Mr. Varkey candidly illustrated his arguments by citing his own instance. "When I wanted to join the Congress Party," said Mr. Varkey, "and stand for election to the Assembly, I took leave from the College for one year and fought the election on the understanding that, if I succeeded, I would resign my teaching post and plunge myself into politics. I succeeded in the election and resigned my post." He exhorted other teachers to do likewise. He said:

> I want more teachers to enter the political field and show to the country that teachers too are a valuable acquisition to the politics of the country. As most of them are not blessed with much of riches, they must have the backing of a party. Join that party you think best for elections. I want able and enthusiastic teachers to enter politics at an early date, and fight out the cause of the country in general and the cause of the teaching profession in particular.

There is much worldly wisdom in the advice but we are obliged to say that Mr. Varkey's conception of the teaching profession as well as of a political career, falls far short of the ideal. The teacher's profession itself, if one has a vocation for it, offers ample scope for the highest service to one's fellowmen. The influence of a great teacher is infinitely deeper and more enduring than that of the most successful politician. Mr. Varkey seems to think that a political career is a better way of "serving the cause." But what is "the cause of the country in general and the cause of the teaching profession in particular"? If serving the country is the only object, a man can fulfil it as well, if not better, as a teacher, than as a party politician who in most cases can look forward to be nothing better than a party hack. Politics too is a great vocation if you feel a call for it independently of whether a political party is willing to put you up as a candidate. Gokhale felt such a call. He did not resign his Professorship in the Fergusson College for many years after he was elected to the Legislative Council. He left the College in 1902 and in two or three years he had started the Servants of India Society to engage in the field of political education which to him meant spiritualising politics. During a fairly close intercourse lasting several years, we have never heard Gokhale plead that he did or said something because of party considerations. His whole conception of politics was that principle should always come before party. That is what he called spiritualising politics. Gokhale's example was worthily followed by Dr. R. P. Paranjpye. The present Principal of the Fergusson College, Dr. G. S. Mahajani, is an elected member of the Bombay Legislative Council. He is a Liberal and sits on the Opposition side.

Unless there has been a radical change in Bombay opinion, of which there is no sign, Mr. Varkey's arguments for treating a teacher in an aided institution on the same footing as a Government employee, will be laughed out of court in this part of the country. These arguments become positively grotesque in the case of Municipalities and Local Boards. In the first place, in theory at least, party politics is not expected to be carried into civic life. In the next place in the districts, high school teachers and college professors constitute the bulk of the educated talent available for civic affairs. To shut them out of local bodies is to deprive the community of the services of some of the best qualified men in the countryside. Mr. Varkey's arguments for keeping teachers out of politics are analogous to those which used to be urged against the enfranchisement of women. Politics is not only a party but a dirty game. Women must be paragons of purity, however much their husbands and sons and brothers fall short of perfection. Teachers are not so sharply distinguishable from the rest of the community as women from men. Mr. Varkey's argument simply comes to this: that they should maintain the perfect ideal of the teacher until they are seduced by a political party which undertakes to make up to them for their voluntary relinquishment of their jobs. Mr. Srinivasa Sastry "plunged" into politics when politics meant to him a lifelong commitment on a small allowance in a highly experimental organization, giving up a safe and comfortable position as a successful educationist. He like Gokhale brought the educationist's spirit to bear on politics. A fairly competent teacher who seeks a political career under the aegis of a party, will not take long to discover that teaching children is a much more interesting and far more spiritually elevating occupation than spending one's time in answering the crack of the party whip. Politics can not be spiritualised so long as the party system is considered indispensable to it.

We turn now to the larger question: Should politics be a game? Should it be a party game? Should it be a dirty game? We have no hesitation in answering all three questions in the negative. In fact the three questions are answered when the first is answered. If politics is a game, it must be a party game and a dirty game. But should it be a game? Mr.

Srinivasa Aiyengar in his recent address to the Madras University on Democracy gave cogent reasons against the party system in politics. The only country where it has worked well is Great Britain. Even there it worked only so long as the ship of State was sailing on smooth waters and the members of Government and leaders of the Opposition came from the same groups, were educated in the same schools and universities and were often closely related by ties of blood and marriage. When politics assumed a serious form, that is to say, when men were divided by convictions and not merely by conventions, the system broke down. Irish Home Rule, Tariff Reform, the Boer War, the powers of the House of Lords—the system was strained to breaking point when these questions confronted it. The Great War saw its complete collapse. For a few years after the war it tried to resume its sway but eight years ago a National Government took its place and Lord Baldwin in inaugurating it thanked God that politics in Britain would no longer be a "party dog-fight." The British party system is essentially a fair-weather system. It is closely modelled on the British national game of cricket. Like the game the British took their politics as a pastime. They could afford to do so because till now they had no competitors in trade, industry and the mastery of the sea. They have now to take their politics seriously. The Dictators, whatever their defects may be, are strenuous men. They live dangerously to themselves and their neighbours. No one ever heard of Signor Mussolini or Herr Hitler or M. Stalin going fishing or skating as a distraction from political preoccupations. The old leisurely conception of politics has become out of date. The new conception should be more in the line of the old Hindu conception of it as dharma. Statesmen can not be party men; they must be for the State as their name requires. With such a conception of politics, it will be as pure and as elevating as divine service. Women, teachers and even students can participate in it with great moral and spiritual benefit.

Russia And Poland:—Quick as lightning on the announcement of the Russo-German Pact came a message from Paris that instructions were sent to the British and French Ambassadors in Moscow to inform the Russian Foreign Minister, M. Molotov, that Poland was then ready to accept Russian aid. The Daily Mail correspondent who sent the message, added that refusal by Poland to admit Russian troops apart from Russian armaments was one obstacle holding up the negotiations for a Pact with Russia. A day later Marshal Voroshilov, Russian Commissar of Defence, stated in an interview in the semi-official, Isvestia, that this was the main cause of disagreement. Britain and France supported Poland. Russia, in fact, was treated as an international Pariah the produce of whose labour was welcome but whose company could not be tolerated within miles of the high caste Poles and their allies, the British and the French. One remembered that some months ago it was announced that Mr. Chamberlain had dined at the Russian Embassy and that it was the first time since the Soviet revolution that a British Prime Minister had broken bread with a Soviet dignitary! Have the British or the French ever agreed to help another Power which objected to their entry into their territory? Would Great Britain have undertaken the defence of France in the last war if the French had refused to admit them into the country? As a matter of fact, the French people were not overjoyed to see their country overrun by foreigners, but since they had to get their help they had to put up with their company. How Britain and France could have encouraged Poland in this silly attitude towards Russia whose help they were courting, we cannot imagine. It almost looks as if Poland was willing to comply with the German demands rather than tolerate the Russians in their country and that she was held back only by the importunity of her West European Allies. It is significant that not an inkling of the obstacle to the Pact with Russia was allowed to the public. What are we to infer from the fact that Great Britain and France instead of telling Poland that hers was an unreasonable objection and that, if she persisted in it, they would wash their hands of the whole affair, let events take their course? Did they think Russia would be so anxious to have the Pact that she would agree to help Poland under the humiliating restriction sought to be imposed on her? Had they been frank with Poland, the Pact with Moscow would have been concluded months ago and Herr Hitler would have had to give up his design on Danzig at least for some years.

The 'Covetous' Indian:—Sir Geoffrey Winterbotham who presided when Mr. Oliver Stebbing read a paper last April on "The European in the New India" at a meeting of the East India Association, London, let fall a revealing remark in his introductory speech. He said that opposition to British interests did not come so much from politicians as from Indian commercial men. "It would not, I think," he said, "be safe to ignore the covetous eye cast by certain Indian commercial interests on British interests, nor the special garb of nationalism with which this covetousness is cloaked." It is philanthropy for the British commercial man to exploit India; it is covetous for the Indian to desire to get the profits of industry and trade of his own country! The British commercial class is responsible for the transformation of the character of British rule in this country from a benevolent paternalism in to an economic imperialism. From the time of the Ilbert Bill it has always opposed the liberalisation of the political system, and supported every measure of repression. But circumstances are proving too strong for it.

ERADICATING COMMUNALISM IN ELECTIONS.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

On account of the treaties, and also because of the deep cleavages between communities, it is impossible to draw the complete picture of democracy on the Party model of England in an Indian State. But surely statesmanship requires not a non-posumus attitude of mind, but the discovery of methods for giving the maximum of democracy which is feasible in consonance with the treaties.

It is gratifying to find that Mr. Sreenivas Iyengar, one of the most eminent of the political leaders in India, has come to the conclusion that Party Government is unsuited for India and has recommended a national or all party form of government. This is the same as the Panchayat form which I have been advocating for over ten years. A different nomenclature was adopted by me in order to emphasise the idea of government by consent and persuasion and not through opposition and the rule of the majority. The arguments in its favour will not be marshalled again; but it is necessary to point out that the word "Party" has a different meaning in democratic and in totalitarian States. The Communist Party in Russia and the Fascist and Nazi Parties in Germany and Italy, do not contemplate the emergence into power of an opposing party as is the case in England. The Congress ideology is much the same, except that violence is not advocated.

When one contemplates the vast achievements of the Soviet in Russia,—witness, for instance, their conquest of the North Pole and the establishment of a permanent station at the Pole with aeroplane and wireless sets manufactured in every detail in Russia and through the courage and the devotion to the Party and its Leader of Russia's young men—doubt arises in the mind whether a party of progress without a blind adherence to Marx is not the best for India. But on account of the impossibility of separating violence from the Soviet System and also because all parties in India are now likely to become communal, the Panchayat or all party system is recommended, although it will not possess the dynamic energy of the Soviet and of Fascism.

Concerning methods two differing systems have been recommended by me; viz, that of direct election with joint electorates and reservation of seats, and that of indirect election with reservation for communal and other interests. In both cases the cabinet would be all party, national or Panchayet. If the life of the legislature is only three years there is no need to provide for a vote of no-nonfidence. Even otherwise, what I recommended is to make the vote as difficult as possible viz., by a three-fourth majority of all existing members of both Houses. I am, however, of Mr. Sreenivas Ayengar's opinion that in such form of government there is no justification and no need for an Upper House. Concerning indirect election, it has to be stated that Gandhiji had recommended adult suffrage and indirect election, at the second Round Table Conference, but he did not insist on it, or give details. If he had done so, probably, the present Hindu-Moslem conflict would not have arisen. Everyone knows the great advantages of direct election over indirect. The chief of them is that members who are elected indirectly would have no interest in educating their master, which is one of the most important needs of democracy; and it might well be a standing instruction to electors to give preference to those who do this kind of work and to those engaged in useful public activities, etc. Gandhiji doubtless knew of the great drawbacks of indirect election; but apparently recommended it on account of the vastness of the areas, the difficulties, expense, intrigues and corruption associated with direct election, and chiefly, I hope, as a solvent for dissolving the communal animosities that are bound to be engendered under any system of direct election which recognized communal interests.

Various methods might be suggested for indirect election. As communal representation is functional more than territorial, it is possible to argue that each member, including those who represent special interests such as labour, should be elected on an All State basis and not territorially. The members thus elected would be less communally minded and more national, than territorial communal representatives but some areas might get no representation, and what is called the touch or contact between voters and members to which both attach great importance is liable to be lost. There are other advantages and drawbacks for both systems, and either could be adopted as may be desired.

It is, however, very clear to me that the original election should be non-communal. The areas might be as small as is necessary, but not too small. It is surely possible, and it is necessary if communalism is to die out ultimately, for the Hindus and Moslems in a small area to select some one person in that area to be their elector without regard to his community. By a system of elimination, some one citizen could easily get 75 per cent of the votes of the adults present. If the communal spirit is so rampant that no one gets it, the remedy is to disqualify that area from the privilege of appointing an elector for the election only. The only qualification of the elector should be that he is himself not a candidate.

The names of the electors should be duly notified and they should meet at convenient centres for selecting the members. Those who wish to stand as candidates for election will submit their names to Government, and lists of all those who are not disqualified under existing rules, will be published and printed lists sent to the electors or to the polling officers of the various election centres. When there are special interests such as labour, planting, etc. that should be indicated in the lists. The candidates should not canvass for votes, but might circulate manifestoes, and might also, if they wish, appear at the election centres and explain their policies. If the election is of members for the whole State, the electors will simply mark the list, one mark for each place and return them to the polling office. There is no need for secrecy, and obvious mistakes—e. g. marking too many names could be corrected on the spot. At the central polling office, these lists would be scrutinised with the help of assessors. The system adopted in Mysore for the civil service when competition was open to all India, with reservation of a certain number for Europeans is recommended. In this manner it is easy to obtain the number required to represent each community. Whatever communities might have reservation, it is necessary that the depressed classes and minor communities like artisans who never get elected, should have reservation.

When territorial representation is preferred, all that is required is to fix up the number representing each communal interest for each area, and the same Mysore system could be adopted for picking up the required number of names. Interests of the whole State, such as labour, must necessarily be picked up at the central office after counting all the votes. When communal interests are divided territorially the method is, after such interests are sufficiently represented, to omit the names of members of that community with more votes in favour of members with less votes of not fully represented communities until the full number required is secured.

In either case, it is hoped that the whole electorate will not be divided communally or at any rate that the number of such could be varied for different areas and also minimised at each subsequent election. These devices, as also the device of making the electors themselves non-communal, will tend to minimise communal rancour.

I had recommended other methods also for giving a sense of security to minority communities. The most important was that it should be open to any citizen to appeal to the High Court or to the Head of the State that a proposed piece of legislation was likely to affect adversely the interest concerned, (exploiting interests like planting, commerce, landlords being included) and, if he agrees, that the legislation should be held up until the Cabinet or the private member is able to convince a majority of members representing the interest that the legislation is desirable. I had suggested that, if the interest is unrepresented, e.g. Jews or Jains, a member should be co-opted for the purpose of that piece of legislation.

With this tremendous safeguard, minorities will cease to fear communal majorities or exploiting interests; and the need for communal representation will tend to disappear.

Another safeguard would be that every State should have a Public Service Commission presided over by an Englishman or a member of a minority and charged with the duty of carrying out Government's policy towards backward communities. I was the first official in South India in recent times to advocate the need for communal justice in the matter of appointments and could say a great deal about it, if the principle is not now generally accepted. The chief faults of the pure merit system are that there is no absolute standard for judging merit, and that the meritorious are inclined to be clannish in filling up appointments.

The method of election suggested above is purely tentative and experimental. It has no special merit, except that corruption and intrigue would be very greatly minimised and the selection will be made by the best electors in the State. There is fortunately plenty of scope for experiment and mistakes would be rectified after experience is gained.

After the members are elected, whether through direct election or indirect election based on adult suffrage, they should meet at the capital and elect a leader, by a process of elimination so that whoever is finally elected, might have a larger measure of support and gain greater confidence than is possible under the simple majority system. He should proceed to select his colleagues in accordance with his instrument of instructions which should be provided for, important communities and interests being represented in the Cabinet. The Head of the State might perhaps have the power of veto but within strictly defined limits and not so as to make the electorate a mere farce. The Cabinet should have a fixed sum or percentage of revenues and also some power of separate taxation.

The dynamic for this form of government in those Departments which are delegated, would depend on the leader and the leader in this process would be the best man available in the State, and not the best party man or the best demagogue. There is some reason to expect that he might devote continuous attention to the really urgent problems, such as poverty and illiteracy and educating the young to such a form of citizenship as may be called useful, adaptive and sacramental. In spite of all theories and temporary successes that blur vision, to love your neighbour as yourself, and to love the children better than yourself, are the only sure foundations and dynamic for a stable and a worthwhile society.

Finally, I entirely agree with Mr. Sreenivas Iyengar that old men are not suited for such leadership in these strenuous times.

ENGLISHWOMEN IN INDIA.

(By J. M. Ganguli.)

[This article has been written with the best of intentions, with a view to draw the attention, of far-seeing Englishwomen to their cultural responsibility in the Empire, the thoughtful discharge of which is bound to create a very good feeling in the Empire people.

In the height of glory, during moments of ease and luxury, one is often unmindful of the effects of one's acts and doings, though such effects may leave far-reaching consequences.

The publication of the article is expected to provoke thinking in respect of such acts and their consequences.—J. M. G.]

How indeed Englishwomen in India pass their time is a question that often arises in one's mind at the sight of the light-hearted and irresponsible manner in which they apparently spend their lives. In the morning you find them out for their constitutional, of course, leaving their children in the care of mere ayahs who lack the education to bring them up properly; some walking on the maidan; some riding in the racecourse; some driving merrily along the riverside. After breakfast they go out shopping at will, to meet the bills of which the poor husbands have to rush to offices to work there for hours. During the day they have music, radio, romantic and adventurous literature, and, of course, the work of the inevitable tailor sitting in the verandah to supervise. A nap on the sofa is also not unusual.

Hours roll by; the engagement of the afternoon come; the telephone rings; friends call; the lady changes into her sports outfit, and drives out for tennis or golf. A few of them, not keen on sports, may care to remember their husbands. A few minutes before five o'clock they get into their cars, red-lipped, red-nailed and elegantly dressed, to go and pick up their husbands from office. Evenings are generally spent in restaurants, or within cinema halls; while nights till late hours, are unavoidably booked, because of dances, gala-nights, Saturday-club engagements and similar other very important functions. Such ever-recuring engagements they seldom let fall through. How else will life be worth living?

In the matter of conventionalism they are punctilious; polite, affable and mannerly, talking and laughing in regulated voice and showing interest in whatever society they may be placed by intelligent nods and occasional uncritical remarks. In their home relationship also they observe manners, meeting their children at appointed hours, giving them a pat or a kiss in conventional style. The husbands also do not go without proper words of endearment; they have these companions at dinner-table; are picked up from office, and are given advice and encouragement without asking. The domestic servants are given orders with precision and seriousness, though the lady of the house may not have the time or inclination to look into the inner working of those orders. The order for dinner, for instance, is given, the menu is detailed, but how and under what conditions the preparations are made, do not worry the pre-occupied lady of the house. After the retirement of a chief justice of Bengal, while his bungalow was being sanitarily cleaned and got ready for his successor, the sanitary officer of the Public Health Department found on entering the kitchen that spades were needed to clean it. Writing to a local paper describing the filthy condition of the kitchen, the doctor expressed his great surprise that the lady of the house had never cared to go the kitchen to see how and under what conditions food on which one's health vitally depended, was cooked.

This doctor had obviously experience of a few government buildings only; for, if he had occasion to look into the kitchen of other English society ladies, he would have found nothing to wonder at in the house of the chief justice, whose wife observed rather than broke the usual rule of her countrywomen in India of not transgressing into the borders of the kitchen area.

There the cook and the servants rule as they please, free from fear of supervision, while the lady of the house is in the drawing room or is out on some of her daily missions, unmindful of the kitchen people's dirty clothes, their dirty habits and their unhygienic methods. When she wants a drink or dish, she rings the bell and the cook or the bearer hurriedly gets into a white-looking costume and attends with the thing wanted served on glazed cutlery. Once, it is said, a bearer while going out to serve noticed a mark on a dish to remove which he spat on it and rubbed it off with his cleaner. When the dishes arrive and tasty effervescence comes out, eaters do not care to know how they were prepared and what impurities they might contain.

Thus an English lady conducts her household. It will be interesting to calculate how much of her time she spends on herself and how much, if at all, on doing duties in respect of others, or on doing useful things. Take off the time spent on her toilet, in the dressing-room, in now and then having a look at the mirror, in novel reading, in outing and shopping, in sports, and on other personal things, and what little time will be found to be left over for duties to husband and children, to home and society! Even when she is out, her mind is evidently pre-occupied with her own self, her face, hair, eye-brow, lips, etc; for, now and then she can be seen taking a small looking-glass out and holding it before her face, which she assiduously paints and powders against weather and wind. Along with the glass comes out a comb to keep every hair in check.

If the time and concentration so diligently devoted to facial appearance and bodily attractiveness were diverted, even in part to the side of constructive usefulness, what could not indeed these intelligent women have done to their family and children, to their society and environment, to their race and to humanity in general!

After all, it is not on how one's face look with paint and powder, and how the hair curls on forehead and round the ears, that human greatness depends. Such greatness is not generated and developed when mind always hovers round the skin and the external features of the body and does not rise higher and reach beyond. A man or a woman is born in duties and charged with responsibilities, the proper sense of which provides the real test of his or her culture and enlightenment. And the higher one's status in life and society the greater are such duties and responsibilities. As women of a country that is now ruling over the best part of the globe, Englishwomen ought to realise that their duties and responsibilities are much greater than in the case of others in similar stations of life. They have to be mothers of children, who can be expected to safeguard and further the interests and welfare of a vast empire; they have to be helpful and inspiring wives to those already engaged in Empire work; they have to be pure and high models of womanhood to the womenfolk of the Empire, who almost instinctively imitate and adopt the ways of their rulers; they must also bear in mind that the whole world consciously or unconsciously, and to a greater or less degree, looks admiringly to the country that out of its original smallness has expanded into world-wide vastness. Such realisation will at once open their eyes to the silliness of the thoughtless, frivolous and irresponsible life that they lead out in India and in the Empire. By leading such life they make people wonder if the race which they represent is really deserving of the world-possessions, which some intrepid, adventurous heroes of yore have secured and left for it. This feeling is spreading and adversely affecting the Empire sense of most of the people constituting the bulk of the British Empire. The inevitable result, whether slow or quick, and whether apparent or unapparent, must be the undermining of the great imperial structure centring on England. There is a growing number of thoughtful men in India, for instance, who are otherwise not averse to continued Indo-British relationship, but who feel that the sort of civilisation identifiable with the life of a great many English women in India is doing great harm to girls here, who are modeling their lives on the English pattern. These girls are neglecting their home duties, ignoring the natural claims on them of their children who are not wanted, becoming vain, ostentatious and averse to work, and inclined to be expensive beyond means. They are adopting scanty-dress fashion, becoming frivolous and thoughtless, and what is worse are displacing in their mind their inherited high moral sense and principles by those which they see openly practised by so many white women and which they find embodied in a majority of film scenario.

Now, the question I ask in all seriousness of Englishwomen, particularly those, who come out to India or to other parts of the Empire, is whether they would consider themselves free from the heaviest responsibility if, as a result of their setting unedifying examples of life, they caused in Empire peoples a feeling of disrespect for the English race or English culture, that is bound to have disruptive reaction on ties, which hold together different races and different countries in the Empire? There are qualities in the English race, which have impressed the Indian mind, but let Englishwomen in India think if, through the life they live, they are helping to strengthen or weaken such impression. If Indian parents have begun to warn their girls against imitating the ways of the women of the ruling race, surely public confidence in the goodness of Indo-British imperial partnership cannot be said to be sound and dependable. Only, if English women would realise what a vital factor such confidence is in the continuity of such partnership, they will, I believe, live differently, cherish other ideals of womanhood than their present, and become conscious of their added responsbility to live the high life, which women of an empire-making country are expected to live.

THE BENEFITS OF PROHIBITION.

(By Prof. Shiv Narayan, Poona.)

Whenever a reform is introduced in earnest, there is invariably great opposition to it. So it was when Thuggee was put down with a stern hand. Again, bitter agitation was stirred up against those good men like the venerable Ram Mohan Roy who raised their voices in favour of the abolition of Sutteeism. Similar has been the experience of those who have striven to stop child marriages, unequal matrimonial alliances, untouchability, etc. To the credit of the British, it should be said that they did not stand in the way of the above-mentioned reforms. It is, therefore, disappointing to see that, in the matter of Prohibition of the sale to all and sundry of intoxicants, Europeans and Parsees, the two most westernised and, therefore, presumably civilised sections of this community in Bombay, should have written and said so much against the efforts of the present provincial government of that province to remove the evil of intemperance from spoiling further the bodies, if not the souls, of a large number of the citizens of what is, or is going to be, the largest city in India. Day after day, letters are published and speeches delivered minimising the havoc wrought by the Demon of Drink. The aid of literature—past and present—is invoked in support of the virtues of wine.

Thirty-five years ago, the Lahore Temperance Union issued a pamphlet entitled From the Pages of the Sages of all Ages, giving quotations in condemnation of the habit of consuming alcoholic liquors and intoxicating drugs, from prophets, poets, philosophers, and prose-writers of various countries of different eras. For every statement in support of Wine, one could quote two in condemnation of it from the literature of almost every language—more so, no doubt, from the sacred books of the Hindus and Mohammedans, who form the majority of the inhabitants of Bombay. Being however a cosmopolitan city, the Gateway of India contains a large number of other communities, some of whom live by the liquor trade even if several of them do not indulge in drinking intoxicating liquors themselves inordinately and possess the power of controlling themselves more than the poorer people of the congested areas of the city who fall a prey to temptation if it happens to come their way. For such people, it is desirable for an outside agency to remove the source of the temptation out of the way, for by doing so, not only is the individual concerned saved, but his family is also assured of receiving a good share of his earnings which would have been squandered on drink. Europeans and Parsees who do not wish to profit by the weakness of their fellow-Bombayites, should welcome any effort which has for its aim the betterment of the people at large. Temperance is no doubt a laudable movement and few will be found to find fault with it, as it preserves the sacred heritage of liberty of the individual. But every rule has an exception to it. For some individuals, it is an easier task to eschew altogether rather than curtail slightly a harmful ingredient of their diet or drink. The Hindus and Mohammedans, therefore, wisely proscribe the consumption of beef and pork respectively. Total abstinence is not seldom more efficacious than mere moderation in the matter of habits of drinking, smoking, eating, etc., which seem to have an insidious tendency to make addicts of those who started with the firm intention of merely taking a little of the new things now and then. Mark the experience of Mark Twain in his book, 'More Tramps Abroad' :—

> The root is not the drinking, but the desire to drink... When the desire intrudes, it should be at once banished out of the mind. A desire constantly repulsed should die then. That should cure the drinking habit.....I can quit any of my 19 injurious habits at any time and without discomfort or inconvenience.....Once I tried my scheme in a large medical way. I had been confined to my bed several days with lumbago. My case refused to improve. Finally the doctor said :—
> "My remedies have no fair chance. Consider what they have to fight besides the lumbago. You smoke extravagantly. Don't you ?'
>
> 'Yes.'
>
> 'You take coffee immoderately ?'
>
> 'Yes.'
>
> 'And some tea?'
>
> 'Yes.'
>
> 'You eat all kinds of things that are dissatisfied with each other's company?'
>
> 'Yes.'
>
> 'You drink two hot Scotches every night?'
>
> 'Yes.'
>
> 'Very well, there you see what I have to contend against. We can't make progress the way the matter stands. You must make a reduction in these things; you must cut down your consumption of them considerably for some days.'
>
> 'I can't, doctor.'
>
> 'Why can't you?'
>
> 'I lack the will-power. I can cut them off entirely, but I can't merely moderate them.'
> He said that that would answer, and said that he would come around in twenty-four hours and begin work again. He was taken ill himself and could not come; but I did not need him. I cut off all those things for two days and nights; in fact, I cut off all kinds of food, too, and all drinks except water, and at the end of the forty-eight hours the lumbago was discouraged and left me.

In the same chapter from which the above interesting account of a remarkable, but by no means unique or solitary, experience has been reproduced, the author relates the impressions produced by two fellow-passengers, known as remittance men, by reason of their being ne'er-do-weels belonging to important families sent abroad with a sum of money in their pockets with a remittance to follow at intervals. One was a young Canadian who was not able to let the whisky bottle alone. He was of a rich and powerful family and could have had a distinguished career and abundance of effective help towards it if he could have conquered his appetite for drink; but he could not do it, so his great equipment of talent was of no use to him. The other was a lad of 19 or 20, and he was a good deal of a ruin as to clothes and morals and general aspect; he said that he was a scion of a ducal house in England and had been shipped for the house's relief; that he had fallen into trouble in Canada and was now being shipped to Australia. The first thing he did in Australia was to get into the lock-up and the next thing he did was to proclaim himself an earl in the police court in the morning and fail to prove it.

The Bombay wine-traders are not the only body that have profitted by catering to the craving for inebriating drinks that converts decent educated men into imbeciles as the above instances prove. Mark Twain recounts the story of the 'New South Wales Corps' whose officers went to importing rum, and also to manufacturing it in private stills in defiance of the Government's commands and protests. They established a close monopoly and kept it strictly in their own hands. They bought rum at an average of two dollars a gallon and sold at an average of ten.....they maintained their devastating hold for 18 or 20 years before they were finally conquered and routed by the Government. Meanwhile they had spread intemperance everywhere. And they had squeezed farm after farm out of the settlers' hands for rum and thus had bountifully enriched themselves.....In one instance they sold a man a gallon of rum worth two dollars for a piece of property which was sold some years later for 100,000 dollars.

'No' to the white man when he offered them wine which they nicknamed, quite appropriately, fire-water. Aborigines of several other countries have paid dearly in somewhat the same way for their yielding to temptation in the shape of the liquor bottle.

In 1887, the Royal Niger Company issued a circular in which was stated that "doubts have been expressed by eminent persons whether the evils of the alcoholic trade with the native races of India, Africa, Polynesia, etc., have not exceeded the benefits conferred by the spreading of British civilisation." This company took credit for having taken the initiative at Berlin to induce the Conference to prohibit the transit of spirituous liquors over the waters of the Lower Niger, a policy supported by Great Britain, Italy and the United States, but opposed by the other Powers. In 1886, the Council prohibited by Regulation the importation of spirituous liquors into the Benue regions. The Council stated that they had not been guided by administrative or humanitarian motives but had acted in the true commercial interests of the shareholders. They had been guided by enlightened self-interest which accepts as an axiom that the permanent success of the Company's extensive operations in Central Africa demands general and progressive trade and this can not be built up on the liquor traffic.

In July 1886, the wrongs and claims of native races formed a prominent topic of discussion at the British and Colonial Temperance Congress which adopted memorials to the Indian Governmental authorities calling attention to the increase of intemperance in India and asking the Government "to take such steps as might effectually diminish or remove the special temptations to alcoholic indulgence in that country."

In May 1887, the following resolutions were adopted at the Westminster Town Hall:—

1. That this meeting of members and friends of the National Temperance League, having learnt with profound regret that habits of intemperance are rapidly increasing in many parts of India, alleged to be largely due to the extension of spirit licenses for revenue purposes, resolves to ask the principal Secretary of State for India to cause immediate inquiry to be made into the facts of the case with a view to the application as speedily as possible of an efficient remedy for this great and growing evil.

2. That as the use of intoxicating liquors by professing Christians in social life and at religious services has led many Mohammedan and Hindu converts to suppose that what they had previously regarded as an unclean thing is an essential element of Christianity, this meeting resolves to request the Committees of the leading Missionary Societies to caution their missionaries against sanctioning any practice that might lead to such an erroneous and mischievous conclusion.

About the same time as the above-narrated events took place, it was declared by responsible officers in India, now and then, that the people of the country did not want facilities for drinking alcoholic beverages and the introduction or importation of wines for the sake of the native inhabitants was an unjustifiable plea. Surgeon Major Pringle declared that if local self-government were granted to the ten million people of the (then) North-west Provinces, not a grog shop would remain in 12 months.

That alcoholic drinks are not a prophylactic against disease has been amply corrobated by the experiences of doctors of almost every land where serious investigation has been undertaken. Even if some of them considered it essential in some cases to prescribe mixtures in which there was a small percentage of alcohols, it was only done when absolutely necessary and if the patient did not object thereto.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Famine Relief:—The timely occurrence of some amount of rainfall in Gujarat has somewhat relieved the acuteness of the situation created by the total failure of the rains in the last two weeks; and it is opportune to comment on some of the measures adopted to meet the emergency. To begin with, we were surprised at the suddenness with which the situation developed. The delay of a fortnight in the regular rains has never before led to such serious results. As a matter of fact, famine conditions do not arise until some months after the failure of the rains. Trade speculation is responsible for raising prices in anticipation of famine. But this very process serves to stimulate imports into the rainless area. To arrest the normal processes of trade is to deprive the stricken areas of the most natural method of minimising their hardships. We were surprised, therefore, at the Ordinance of the Government of Bombay issued a fortnight back forbidding exports of grain and grass. There would be little of either to export from these areas. If as a consequence prices rose, the people must be provided with the cash to buy the articles. Baroda followed the example of Bombay. Hyderabad, it was reported, would likewise follow the same course. In a time of stress, safety lies in neighbouring States pooling their resources to fight the danger. The necessity of a strong unitary central Government is never more evident than on occasions of wide-spread famine or epidemics. The Bombay Government issued an order this week relaxing the restrictions imposed by the Ordinance. The great thing in times of stress is to keep the people in good heart. In many places the people instinctively turned to prayer to bring down the rains and we, for one, can not say that their prayers had nothing to do with the welcome showers that have fallen in several places. Food grains and to a less extent fodder can be made available by organised relief measures by the State and private agencies. The greatest difficulty is water. There was much activity in exploring the sub-soil sources at one time but the absence of any serious deficiency in the rainfall in recent years, has lulled the public and the Government into a false security.

Prime Ministers' Conference:—When Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose was elected for the first term to the Presidentship of the Indian National Congress, one of the first things he projected was a Conference of all Congress Prime Ministers in Calcutta at which he would, of course, have taken the chair. Somehow this did not come off. But the idea has been kept in view. A Premiers' Conference is being held in Poona this week. All Congress Prime Ministers, except Dr. Khan Sahib of the North-Western Frontier Province, are expected to attend it. It is to be presided over not by the Congress President, Babu Rajendra Prasad; nor by Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya who loyally acquiesced in being passed over for the Presidentship in favour of Mr. Prasad when Mr. Subhas Bose abdicated; but by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel in his capacity of Chairman of the Parliamentary Board of control. It is impossible to resist the surmise that this means that the Sardar is likely to be the first Federal Prime Minister if the Congress decides upon accepting office in the Federation, on getting such terms as it may be able to secure from the British Government and the Indian States. The Sardar, as we have observed before, is a capable and resolute administrator. But the Federal Government's functions will be administrative only to a small extent. They will chiefly concern questions of high policy. In order to discharge such functions the Sardar will have to develop some qualities which he has hitherto rather neglected. One is the capacity to return the soft answer which turneth away wrath. Not only has the Sardar not cultivated this valuable quality in one who has to deal with great issues and all sorts and conditions of people. He has rather got into the habit of provoking needless antagonism even amongst friends by being aggressively and obtrusively outspoken. To call a spade a spade, does not need any measure of forethought. Every child does it. But to detect the idea behind the spade which makes it useful as a garden implement and to stress the value of that in preference to the rude embodiment of it which one can touch and handle, demands a high degree of mental discipline. A man who has a great work on hand can not afford to encumber himself with antagonisms arising from neglect to weigh his words.

Advice to Orthodox Hindus :—The Reformer has no claim to tender advice to orthodox Hindus except that arising from its obligation to comment, according to the best of its lights, on matters of social import. If the Prime Minister of Madras had adhered to the views which he had expressed last year about bringing about the reform of admitting Harijans to temples with the consent and cheerful co-operation of orthodox Hindus, it might have been delayed three or at the most five years; but there would have been no occasion for resentment such as that caused by the extraordinary measure which he has just piloted through the Madras Legislature. It is not necessary to recapitulate the circumstances which had led him to adopt the present line. We see from the newspapers that orthodox Hindus are organising a deputation to the Governor-General to request him to withhold his assent to the Bill. We think that it will injure more than help the cause of orthodoxy for its champions to adopt this course. Lord Linlithgow is most unlikely to overrule Mr. Rajagopalacharya in a question of this kind. And in our opinion, His Excellency will be ill-advised to do so. The credit and responsibility for the measure must be allowed to rest where they belong on the devout President of the Harijan Sevak Sangh and the Prime Minister of Madras. Orthodox people should reconcile themselves to the company of Harijans in temples as they have already reconciled themselves to it in railways, Legislative and Municipal Councils, and in prisons. Those of them who can not do so, may be content with doing puja in their own homes. As a matter of fact, many Harijans, particularly in rural areas, are more religious-minded than those who make a parade of their piety. The protection of religion in future will have to be undertaken by these hitherto despised classes more than by the professional priestly class which has ceased to have any beliefs worth the name. The Prime Minister of Madras, we feel sure, would have preferred the reform to come with less dramatic suddenness. It is the apprehension that the situation might get out of hand if something was not immediately done to appease the crusaders, which evidently led to his resorting to a Governor's Ordinance followed by this legislation. Orthodox Hindus might reflect that when the whole world is ablaze with revolution, the admission of Harijans to temples is a trival affair.

Chinese Labour for Indian :—We referred in an editorial Note last week the emigration of unskilled labour from India, to the remark of a Ceylonese student in Bombay that Chinese labour will be called in to replace Indian labour whose emigration to Ceylon was recently banned by the Government of India. and its crass prejudice. Christian Missions exist avowedly to make converts and it is no vilification of them to note that they have an interest in propagating their faith. The Examiner's opinion of Hinduism has no relevance to the proposal that the five settlements should be brought under Government management. "Why bring in the religious question at all?" asks the Examiner. The answer is that Christian Missions are, as religious organizations, bent on gathering as many non-Christians as possible into its fold. The so-called "criminal tribes" are not backward because they have not been taught the Gospel. Europe has been taught the Gospel for a thousand years and today that continent knows no law but that of armed might. It requires a great deal of assurance on the part of the Examiner to point its finger of scorn at Hinduism, seeing what its own Church has made of Europe—a veritable hell on earth. If it is argued that the Catholic Church is not responsible for the state of Europe, it can be argued equally that Hinduism is not responsible for the backwardness of sections of the population. We would suggest to Government that the first thing to do to redeem these classes, is to remove the stigma of 'criminal' attached to their names. They are just simple, unsophisticated folk who have lagged behind in the race of life. Education in the broadest sense is their main desideratum. It is worthy of note that they are not "untouchables" in the Hindu social system.

Khaksar Discipline :—We reprint from Asia an account of the Khaksar movement by Mr. Amiya Chakravarti. The most recent instance of Khaksar discipline is reported in the Pioneer. A high dignitary of the movement, Gulam Mustafa, Amir Khas of Janbaz, was visiting Lucknow and Mr. Wahiduddin Hyder, Khaksar "General Officer Commanding" for the U.P., the C.P. and Bengal, had orders from headquarters to honour the visitor by firing a salute of one hundred and one crackers. The Lucknow Police forbade the firing as a public nuisance, we suppose. Mr. Hyder thereupon postponed the salute. For this act of disobedience he was ordered to recive four stripes. At a gathering of 3,000 people, the condemned man handed over the whip to Mr. Newazish Ali Khan, a Khaksar official commissioned to carry out the sentence, and received the four stripes from him. The Pioneer in a later report says that the crowd was disappointed at the mildness of the strokes which were presumably intended to be symbolical.

India and the Threatened War :—"Egypt and Singapore," writes the Times of India, "are respectively India's first lines of defence, both West and East." We are sure that Indians will feel proud of themselves after this subtle compliment to them by contrast to the more nearly affected Egyptians and Australians, both of whom are better armed to resist aggression. The Times of India's great tribute is all the more satisfying in view of our inability to do very much to persuade, cajole or threaten even our partners in the Empire to treat our countrymen better—in Burma and in Ceylon, in East Africa and in South Africa. The reason for this sudden use of bellicose language and the feverish pitching of India's frontiers all over the world, is directly inspired by the Congress resolution which refuses assistance from India in the event of war. Similarly it was reported some months back—perhaps with the ill-advised intention of rousing American feeling notoriously non-interventionist—that President Roosevelt had told a Senate Committee that America's frontier was in Central Europe—an extension of the Monroe Doctrine gratifying to Anglo-French ears. President Roosevelt, however, with a better knowledge of his people, promptly repudiated the report. Apart from the Congress resolution which, it is reported, the Muslim League also will shortly adopt, there is no interest in India in the next war, of which the only certain thing is that nobody will know exactly what it is about. Lord Baldwin apparently referring to the present crisis over Danzig, said recently that "the world was not safe for democracy" and that "the ultimate freedom of mankind would depend on the issue of the war." These words could with much greater force have been applied to the crisis of last September. A war over Danzig would not be a war for democracy. If the standards applied to the Sudeten areas are applied to Danzig, Danzig is German and should be handed over to Herr Hitler. The Times of India recognises the weakness of Danzig as a rallying point for democracies when it observes that Danzig is a mere symbol. When conveniently forgetting its own fervent support of Mr. Chamberlain and Munich, it complacently deplores "the confusion of last September," it implies that the one great reason for a war is Britain's preparedness today.

Europe on the Eve :—While the nations of Europe are assembled in armed camps, two last-minute appeals for peace have gone forth. President Roosevelt has addressed the King of Italy in a message similar to his message to the Dictators last April, seeking his intervention in the cause of peace. His Holiness the Pope has issued a call to the nations urging the peaceful solution of international differences. If these fail, then war breaks loose on Europe and on the world. In his speech on Thursday to the House of Commons, Mr. Neville Chamberlain said that he had tried his best to avert the calamity, that the Russian Pact was a complete surprise to his Government, but that Britain and France would stand by their pledges to Poland. He was still eager for a settlement by discussion. It was not the time for recriminations. The speeches of the Opposition leaders and the emergency measures adopted by Parliament gave Mr. Chamberlain's Government the authority to face the crisis with the entire strength of the nation behind them. The next few days will decide. Whatever the decision, the past two years of "war in peace" seem to have ended.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, August 26, 1939.

RUSSIA'S PACT WITH GERMANY.

We have just passed through what is without doubt the most eventful week of the post-war period. News from the European capitals the whole of the preceding week spoke of impending war. The Anglo-French Governments, it was reported, were ready for any eventuality. The military mission to Russia had resumed their talks with Soviet representatives after a short suspension, said a Moscow message, which went on to announce the conclusion of a trade agreement between Russia and Germany. The great question on Monday evening was whether, in view of the determination of the Peace Front powers, Herr Hitler would persist in his demands on Poland. Twenty-four hours saw a startling change in the relative strengths of the Peace Front and the Axis. The Soviet Government, it was announced from Berlin and confirmed later by Moscow, had negotiated a non-aggression pact with Germany, and Herr von Ribbentrop was proceeding to Moscow to conclude the agreement. By Thursday news came through that the Soviet-Nazi pact had been completed. The terms of the pact, generally speaking, bind the two countries not to go to war against each other, either alone or jointly with a group of other nations. Provision is further made for consultation and close collaboration between the two countries. Then, again, if a third power undertakes "warlike" action against one of the parties, the other will in way help the third power. In view of these terms, we cannot but accept as correct the semi-official interpretation of the new policy put out from Berlin. It runs :

> The change in Russo-German relations is not a one-day political affair but an event of momentous importance. It will be decisive in the future formation of Russo-German relations and will remain revolutionary for a long time to come. The text will confront Europe with a fact which in days to come, will be regarded as one of the most decisive events in world history. All must recognise what it means for Germany and Russia to be returning to a foreign policy which for centuries has proved be successful for both peoples.

In the first flush of excitement many thoughtless accusations are hurled against Russia and Germany for the present pact. Forgetting that Mr. Chamberlain had his mind on appeasing Germany, some writers have accused the Soviet of double-dealing. Ignoring, on the other hand, that Britain was negotiating for the past six months with Soviet Russia, critics charge Germany with linking up with the Communists.

Those who had suggested the possibility of an alliance between Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia, have been ridiculed in the democracies as fantastic prophets of gloom. Now almost the nightmare has become a reality. It is strange that several German writers should have seen an understanding between Russia and Germany as inevitable. There have been two notable warnings in the recent past: Dr. Peter F. Drucker in "The End of Economic Man" his readers that the great fallacy of Euro Left wing parties, belief in an irreconc conflict between Germany and Russia, has rise to the illusion of the Rightists that Fas is pro-capitalist. He sees an inevitable between Germany and Russia because of and ideological similarities. "Fascism," argues in brief, "is the stage reached Communism has been proved an illusion. it has been proved as much of an ill in Stalinist Russia as it was pro an illusion in pre-Hitler Germany," recommend all those who feel bewildered the sudden turn of events, to peruse carefully concluding chapter of Dr. Drucker's stri analysis. Approaching the subject from ano angle, Herr Rauschning, himself once a lea member of the Nazi Party, gives his reade "Germany's Revolution of Destruction," factors within the party making for such alliance. "In the spring of 1937, before huge crop of executions in the Russian arm he writes, "a number of provincial Ger newspapers were surprisingly busy with Russ events, which were being interpreted as rev ing a new development of Nationalism in Bolshevik State, and its purging of Jewish ments and of doctrinaire revolutionists." then he concludes with the signific words, "Germany and Russia, if they co together, will radically transform the wor That alliance is Hitler's great coming stroke It is difficult to believe that what seems have been considered inevitable or highly proba by so many German writers, could have be altogether a surprise in Britain, in France in the United States of America. It is ev more incredible that a responsible statesm like Lord Baldwin should refer to Communis as a peril to Democracy equally with Fascis as he did a week earlier in a speech to a Ne York audience, unless he was aware of t futility of the British negotiations.

As for the countries which are affected by decision, Italy, it is probable, was a party to negotiations and, in the immediate future at a rate, has reason to welcome this accession strength to the European side of the Axi Japan, at present involved in a series of incide with Russia in the East, sees nothing less th desertion by her friends, a danger that w obvious to most observers. There is a strik similarity between the position of Japan in re tion to her Axis colleagues and that of Franc and England in relation to Russia. While th supporters of Russia blame the dilatory tactics the Anglo-French Governments for Russia surprise pact with Germany, the apologists of Axis hold Japan's delay in declaring hers wholly on the said of the Axis Powers, to one reason for her present position. It will in no way suprising if the agreement betwe Germany and Russia leads to better relation between Japan and Britain. An Anglo-Japanese agreement becomes essential in view of threatening atmosphere in Europe. Mr. Chamberlain may reverse his tactics of supporting peace in Europe in the interests of British policy in the East, and work for an Asiatic peace to increase his strength in Europe where he is pledged, rather indiscreetly, to fight Poland's battle over Danzig. It is very likely that such a possibility has been in Mr. Chamberlain's mind throughout the Tokio negotiations. Britain at home has adopted emergency laws and an urgent meeting of Parliament was summoned for Thursday. Poland, the country most directly affected, has not been deterred from her determination to resist aggression. The first fruits of the Soviet-Nazi pact will without doubt be a German drive against Poland. There are reports that Herr Hitler expects to take Danzig, the Corridor and even Silesia, before the week is out. It would be a disaster of the first magnitude if the undoubted courage of the Poles and the reiterated decision of the French and the British to go to their assistance were put to the test. For Herr Hitler has won the first victory.

SIR SIVASWAMI ON INDIAN DEFENCE.

Though Sir Sivaswami Aiyar can not, like Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, claim to speak as a soldier, he has, perhaps more than any other Indian, made a study of the problems of Indian Defence from the statesman's broader point of view. His speech at St. Joseph's College, Bangalore, was a severe denunciation of the policy pursued by the Government of deliberately neglecting to prepare the people of India to defend themselves. Sir Sivaswami said :

> England has been pursuing, in my opinion, a foolish and insane policy in not trusting the people of India sufficiently and training them for their defence, for England thinks that if India learns to defend herself, she may turn her arms against England herself. Indians are not of her own blood; they are not her own race. She is willing to trust Australians, New Zealanders and other Dominions.

Sir Sivaswami's reason for England not training India for self-defence is true. It is, however, the reason of all foreign Governments which do not identify themselves with their subjects. Race and blood do not count. The United States, though of the same race, blood, religion and language, broke away from Great Britain; and it is the fear that the other Dominions may do the same, which inspires the attitude of the mother country to the Dominions as the result of the American secession. India was won for Britain by Indian troops and with Indian money. For many years the East India Company followed the policy of self-sufficiency in the matter of defence. It was when the collapse of the Indian Mutiny assured Britain of her position of domination that she began to make fundamental changes in her Indian policy. The opening of the Suez Canal had shortened the route to India. Britain had the mastery of the sea which made her confident of being able to transport troops from Great Britain to India at any time. Any other country in the same position would have followed the same "foolish and insane policy." The only difference is that Britain made high professions which other Imperialisms did not make. The course which British rule took in India, so markedly different from that taken by it or other foreign rule elsewhere, is due to the same causes as those which made the history of Islamic rule in this country different from what it was in Persia and Egypt.

The situation at present is entirely changed. The mastery of the sea is disputed by Italy on the Mediterranean and by Japan on the Pacific seas. That is what makes it quite probable that, in the event of war, Great Britain will not be able to send men and material to defend India. The same thing happened during the last War. India made contributions in men, money and material. British statesmen have no vision. It is only within the last five years, since the conquest of Ethiopia by Italy, and the invasion of China by Japan that British statesmen have realised the actualities of the present day. And even now they would have failed to do so but for the determination of Germany to regain her lost lands and status as a Great Power. It will take us far beyond the scope of this article to go more fully into this question. But what we have said so far is relevant because for want of a sufficient appreciation of it, even Sir Sivaswami makes the mistake of defending the despatch of Indian troops to Egypt and Singapore as the easiest and least costly means of protecting India. Pushed to its logical conclusion, this line of reasoning would lead to the conclusion that the Indian Army should invade Italy, Germany and Japan in order to protect herself. Even Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan regards the long coast-line of India as the sole line of Indian Defence. If the British Government had not acquiesced in the annexation of Ethiopia by Italy, the latter would not have come within twelve hours' bombing distance of Bombay. Now that she is actually there, India should engage herself in defensive measures instead of going out more than half-way to meet the probable aggressor. Her going out will lighten the task of Italy which will be nearer her home-base by some three thousand miles and will have a shorter line of communication to maintain. The same argument applies to Singapore. Japanese bombing planes, if they want to reach Calcutta, will not first go to Singapore. They will follow the route which Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has taken to China. There is a controversy going on among experts on the question whether under modern conditions greater advantage rests with the defensive or offensive positions. A strong body of expert opinion seems to favour the former. Even a layman can see that in fighting near one's home one is at a greater advantage than in fighting in a far-away foreign land.

THE MUCH-ABUSED MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

(By. J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

People are often misjudged in spite of their good intentions and in spite of their being instrumental, sometimes unwittingly, in rendering good service or furthering a good cause. That is because, those who judge are often unable to dispel the prejudice of their own outlook in order to see things clearly and appraise their true values. Propaganda by self-interested people and by over-zealous reactionaries makes matters all the more smoky and less clear for penetrating vision and correct judgment. Many people, however, lose courage and forsake their convictions under the stress of such misjudgment which brings adverse criticism and causes loss of popularity.

That the British Premier, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, has not been deflected from his way of thinking and acting, in spite of abuse and criticism from all possible quarters, speaks well for the strength of his personality and for the courage of his convictions. Not to speak of those in other lands who, inspired sentimentally by propaganda in favour of so-called democracy, have been hard in criticising him, the people of his own country who have been benefited by his cautious and far-seeing policy, have also denounced him in good taste and bad. He has been caricatured, abused and misrepresented in all possible manners; but, indifferent to everything, he has pursued the cautious path of long-range diplomacy, which is traditional of the British people and which has built up the world-wide British Empire. And, thereby, he has probably saved the British Empire.

At the time of the Munich Agreement, England was hardly strong enough to meet the Axis-Powers in an armed conflict, particularly with the Japanese menace in the Far East and the success of Fascism in Spain. Mr. Chamberlain's Munich policy was, therefore, a very deep one, calculated to save England from the grave uncertainty of a life-and-death battle. It is easy enough for those not burdened with the heavy responsibility, of preserving and looking after the interests of a country to indulge in criticisms inspired by shallow and very often unreal ideological propaganda. But for one having Prime Ministerial responsibilities, it is necessary to deliberate and exercise the greatest caution and not to be swayed by passing comments and irresponsible criticisms. Such a sense of responsibility Mr. Chamberlain has abundantly shown by gaining time through the Munich Agreement for England to augment her military strength and to negotiate important alliances with other powers against the Axis-combination. At the time of Munich, England had only the formal alliance of France against the Germano-Austria-Italy, Spain and Japan, combination. England's historical traditions has always been against taking the field against a numerically superior combination. The English race is not impulsive like the Germans or emotional like the French; but, it is cautious and calculating. It perfectly understands business and believes in the virtue of perseverance. Its diplomatic moves are, therefore, deep and well thought out. No wonder that those moves have succeeded not only in preserving English interests, but in spreading and developing them throughout the two hemispheres. How it manouevred against Napoleon perseveringly in Spain, how it formed an overwhelming European alliance against him, how in the last war it worked up world opinion against Germany and brought about a crushing alliance against that country, how it succeeded even in winning over to its side Italy, which was in treaty relationship with Germany, etc.—all that is recent history, shows the great diplomatic skill and abilities of the E... race. Mr. Chamberlain would have disproved ... possession of such racial skill and abilities in ... and in his Government if he had acted on the spur ... an impulse, the impulse of saving a small country ... far-off Central Europe. From the point of view of ... idealised ethics but of realities of his country's ... preservation, a hasty plunge into a very risky ... without marshalling its allied strength, would ... been most short-sighted. make very useful alliances with other countries against Italy and Germany. That the Chamberlain policy has borne fruit is evident from the fact that the temper of the Axis-powers has appreciably cooled down. Another great success of Mr. Chamberlain has been that his policy by provoking popular criticism of his own self, which hardly hurt him, has alienated world sympathy all the more from the Axis-Powers, who have to be represented in black colours and blood-thirsty inhuman character by the critics of Mr. Chamberlain in order to give more colour and significance to their criticisms of his so-called weak-kneed policy. Such alienation of sympathy can only be very useful to Mr. Chamberlain's mother country. Mr. Chamberlain's policy has so much succeeded in this respect that in India public feeling in some quarters has been excited even against Japan, and England's yielding to Japan has been criticised as further unapprovable weakness of the British Premier. Such Indian feeling against Japan cannot be beneficial to present and future Indian interests. India may not approve of Japanese action in China, and may sympathise with the latter, but it is to her vital interest not to antagonise her relationship with her Asiatic sister, who has also been for many centuries, through Buddhism, in cultural relationship with India. India's part in Sino-Japanese quarrel ought to be, therefore, that of a peace-maker and sympathetic negotiator. For let India, China and Japan remember and realise that a perfect sisterly understanding and closest combination and responsive all round co-operation between them, are needed for forming a strong bulwark in Asia against the arrogant imperialism and deep hatred towards the non-white people of Asia and of other countries of all the European races, without which their safety and cultural identity must remain in gravest danger.

DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT IN INDIAN STATES.

(By K. Chandy, Kottayyam.)

A great deal of needless confusion and difficulties have been caused through the mixing up of the medieval idea of the Divine Right of kings in the Indian idea of sovereignty. Mr. S. Sreenivasa Iyenger, one of our leading political thinkers, has recently shown that the Hindu idea of sovereignty is different from the medieval European notion of it, and that sovereigns were sometimes elected.

The Divine Right of kings appears to be in direct descent from the Holy Roman Empire. The Emperor was the Vice-Regent or representative of God on earth in matters secular, as the Pope was in matters religious. Feudal kings, and afterwards national kings, assumed the same privilege. The authority of the Pope over the vice-regent was acknowledged and afterwards contested. In England Henry the Eighth repudiated it and assumed power for the whole domain, both secular and religious. This Divine Right was expressed very clearly on a tragic occasion. "A subject and a sovereign are clean different things. The liberty and freedom of the people did not consist in their having a share in the government; that is nothing pertaining to them."

History has travelled very far in Europe from that tragic notion. The general will is now the accepted source of sovereignty. Even Fascists and Communists pay it lip-service. Hitler is the leader, and Stalin is Comrade. Neither claims divine right to rule.

Political sagacity and absence of logical analytic thinking are both characteristic of the British race; and it is not surprising that this divine right which no longer exists in Europe and which is not germane to India, appears to have become associated with the idea of autocracy in States.

High expert authority and practical example have already been quoted to show that the Indian sovereign is not an autocrat by Divine Right, whose will is law and ultimate authority. He is the upholder and the embodiment of Dharma, the good life for himself and for all his people. Dharma must necessarily function for the economic and moral good of society. There could be no Dharma in a State without the Ruler and his people both practising it.

Sree Martanda Varma's dedication of the State to Sree Padmanabha Swamy may be referred to again in this connection. Besides being an act of high policy, it was also an act of consecration, not for establishing a Hindu political state in which non-Hindus are aliens but for establishing and upholding Hindu Dharma as the trustee of God; a Dharma which upholds the good life, whether of Hindu, Mahomedan or Christian.

This Dharma is now being upheld and administered in Indian States with the help of two or perhaps three constitutional advisors with more or less definitely defined spheres of advice—advice which is normally followed. These are the Resident and the Dewan in all States, and the Chief Justice in cases of capital sentence or its commutation in many or most States.

If the ancient Indian idea of Dharma and the modern notion of division of sovereignty are both clearly grasped, it will be found that there is nothing revolutionary, unconstitutional or un-Indian in the appointment of a fourth advisor for submitting to the Maharajah the wishes of his people and helping him in upholding Dharma in those departments which may be delegated. Indian Dharma and the Western General Will have the same foundation and the same purpose. It is only the notion of an autocrat by Divine Right which is incompatible with either. Gandhiji has bluntly and forcibly contrasted autocracy towards subjects and deference towards the Resident and Resident's entourage. The position is not fundamentally different from that held by chiefs in the Malaya States and in the African Colonies. It is not difficult to understand that the position of a leader of the people for upholding and administering Dharma or in the European phraseology, the general will, is far more legitimate, useful and dignified, and those are bad advisors who do not frankly acknowledge this patent fact.

I have not come across any savants' opinion reconciling the origin of autocratic Kingship in Moslem countries with the Prophet's democratic or equalitarian views; but there seems to be no doubt that in India the Mahomedan sovereign's will was autocratic. This, however, is comparatively recent history and should be distinguished from the more ancient idea. The Mikado of Japan is regarded as divine; so long as elder statesmen guarded that divinity and guided policy, Japan was on the right path. The present conquest of power by the military party is probably another object-lesson of the danger of divinity in government and of the need for laying emphasis on the importance of the general will.

Another cheap argument which is misleading the country is that it is the Prince who is in treaty relationship with the Paramount Power, and could not, therefore, delegate any of his autocratic powers to the people. It has to be conceded that when these treaties were originally entered into, neither the Prince nor the Company thought in terms of the people. Each was thinking of personal safety and interest. But treaties have to be interpreted in the light of subsequent history and of the pledges given and taken for good government, which also has been incorporated in several treaties. The Paramount Power has itself declared in unmistakable terms that it will not stand in the way of democratic advance in the States. A fetish is also being made of the old exploded notion of unitary sovereignty. The argument seems to be that, as sovereignty is indivisible and diarchy useless, the treaties block responsible government. Sovereignty as stated already is divisible. Even sovereign states, recognized as such in international Law, have only divided sovereignty. Some element of Diarchy sticks to almost all sovereignties. It is easy to argue that full responsible government is not feasible on account of treaties, that diarchy is unwholesome and, therefore, let us go on as in the past with some small largesses thrown out to appease popular agitation. Such an argument amounts in effect to what the Americans call showing a poker face—that is, not revealing the weakness of one's hands. There is the sovereignty which is absolutely indivisible. That passed with Genghis Khan. The League of Nations, the Peace Front, the Axis Bloc, etc., do divide up absolutism in sovereignty, apart from division within the sovereign states—e.g. the Senate and the President of the United States. And whereas responsible government is incompatible with the medieval divine right and Mahomedan absolutism, it is by no means incompatible with Indian sovereignty. In fact if the general will is understood in a religious or sacramental sense, as it should be understood, it becomes identifiable with the Dharma of a Hindu sovereign. Democracy thus understood, is only a method—the best available—for establishing Dharma in a State. It will then be discovered to be the crown of the Hindu (old Indian) idea of sovereignty, and in no radical manner opposed to it.

PROHIBITION AND POVERTY.

(By Paul Santamurti, the Lucknow Ashram)

Prohibition Laws, Debt Relief Laws, Tenancy Legislation ensuring equitable taxation, creation of Irrigation facilities, and means of communication, the starting of Agricultural Co-operative Societies to provide marketing facilities, seeds and loans of implements, provision for education and medical relief are some of the important and urgent needs of the Indian peasantry today. Ours is an agricultural country and eighty-five per cent of our population live in the villages. Out of them nearly nine-tenths depend directly or indirectly upon land for their livelihood. The real India lives in the seven-hundred thousand villages of India. For the past few months no other question has attracted so much the attention of the people of India as this problem of Prohibition. For the present I will avoid the religious, moral and the medical aspects of the question and deal with it purely from a economic point of view. I will deal first with a few of the questions raised by those who object to Prohibition. First of them is the loss of revenue. Provincial Governments of India get nearly twenty crores of rupees every year from their Excise Departments. Now, if Prohibition is enforced there will be a huge loss to the exchequer and the Governments will not be able to carry on their work. Until the year 1915 the Government of India were, year after year, sending ship-loads of opium to the ports of China and the poor Chinese had to pay for it, or face the grim alternative of war. The late Mr. Gopal Krishna Gokhale urged the necessity of stopping this iniquitous practice of forcing a helpless sister nation to swallow poison in the name of the people of India. His opponents, like Lord Curzon and Lord Minto, said that, if the opium traffic [illegible] given up, the Government of India would lose the extent of rupees thirty crores a year and [illegible] consequently collapse. Gokhale said that he [illegible] rather see the whole of India being engulfed in [illegible] earthquake and going to the bottom of the sea [illegible] allow such a great crime be to committed in [illegible] name of the people of India, who were, after [illegible] helpless. Now the opium traffic is gone and [illegible] protagonists have gone, the revenues derived through the forcing of opium down the throats of [illegible] Chinese people is gone, but the Government of India has not collapsed. If you [illegible] maintain your standard of administration [illegible] in the matter of pay and allowances only [illegible] not in other ways, only through immorality [illegible] crime, then there is something fundamentally wrong in the standard of administration and [illegible] remedy is not to continue the wrong but to change [illegible] standard. A vigorous policy of retrenchment of [illegible] cost of administration, scaling down the rates of [illegible] and emoluments so that they may bear some reasonable proportion to the economic standards of [illegible] country, and, if necessary, even exploring the avenues for fresh taxation are some of the remedies, but to continue to force the helpless and voiceless millions of people of India to drink and ruin themselves in order to keep a few at the top in luxury, ease and comfort can never be the remedy. It is neither expedient nor moral. Some people say that educational institutions, like Colleges, and Universities have to be maintained so that the children of the upper classes may have liberal education. But tomorrow the people of the land in a body give up drink, what will happen to the students of India if they are always to depend for their own educational needs upon people's drinking. I know of my countrymen especially, the youths. If this question is placed before them in the form in which some opponents of Prohibition would put it, they would rather prefer to go without any education whatsoever than to insist upon their being educated at the cost of the souls and bodies of millions of their own fellow countrymen.

Happily the question is not so absurd as this. There is ample scope for preventing wastage in the educational field and save lots of money. The Vice-Chancellors, for example, do not need rupees five thousand and five hundred a month. Then the second objection of the anti-Prohibitionists is that it will lead to illicit manufacture, sale and consumption of drinks and drugs and that the people will resort to smuggling and other sorts of crime and that, therefore, it will be better to allow people to drink publicly than to encourage them to do so privately. All religions and nations have from times immemorial held that theft, adultery, murder, and cheating are deadly sins. Every nation has made penal laws forbidding these things. Yet in every country we have thieves, adulterers, murderers and deceivers. Every honest citizen helps the administration of the country to suppress crime and punish offenders, but nobody has ever proposed the repeal of penal laws because crimes continue to be committed clandestinely. A vigorous policy of detection, speedy trial and deterrent punishment will easily put an end to all crimes against Prohibition laws, especially in a country like India where people are by nature law-abiding and peaceful.

And then the third objection that is very often raised is that Prohibition has failed in America. This objection is raised more from ignorance of Indian conditions than from anything else. In America it is not considered socially dis-reputable to drink. On the occasions of marriages and other important social gatherings, it is considered mark of social esteem to offer to the guests costly drinks. In India it is not so. Religious sentiment, public opinion, the national interests, and humanitarian justice are on our side, and we can go ahead, and demonstrate to the world that, where the strong and mighty have failed, the poor and the weak will succeed.

Lastly, we have to consider the question from the point of view of those who are directly affected by the prohibition policy of the Government. As I have already said the real India lives in the villages. I have recently been touring in about three-hundred villages of the United Provinces making enquiries from house to house, person to person. The average income of a peasant's family, consisting on an average of one man, one woman and three children is less than rupees eighty-four per annum. His expenses, to put them as low as possible, come to rupees one-hundred and ten per annum. Here is the budget. Rs. 2/-/- per month per adult for food, Rs. 1/-/- per child per month for food, that is Rs. 7/-/- per month or Rs. 84/-/- per annum for food. Two pairs of dhoties at Rs. 1/8/- a pair Rs. 3/-/-. Two Kurtas at Rs. -/12/- each Rs. 1/8/- i. e. Rs. 4/8/- for clothes of a man. Two saris at Rs. 1/8/- i. e. Rs. 3/-/-. Two kurtas at Rs. -/12/- Rs. 1/8/- and two duppattas at Rs. 1/-/- each, Rs. 2/-/-, total Rs. 6/8/- for a woman. Three children will have Rs. 3/-/- for clothes. Rs. 14/-/- for all. Rs. 12/-/- for all emergency expenses such as births, deaths, marriages, sickness and other unexpected items. There we have Rs. 110/-/-. So in good and bad seasons alike, every Indian peasant has to borrow at least Rs. 26/-/- per year or go without barest necessities for nearly four months in the year. If, in addition to this, the head of the family begins to drink and spends even Rs. 3/-/- or more every month what will happen to the family. I am only speaking on behalf of the people who earn on an average Rs. -/1/6 per day. It is this class that needs Prohibibition and they are thankful that it has come to stay. In every society, there are people of this type and they are the majority. There is also a class which fattens itself by exploiting this class. The weaker, the more helpless, the exploited class has become, the more profitable and more easy it is for the exploiting classes to keep them in subjection and bondage. And I am not saying anything about the interests of exploiting classes. They know to safeguard their own interests. From the point of view of the down and out, of the poor and needy and starving and naked, Prohibition is a blessing. We sometimes hear a flippant argument that drunkenness helps one to drown all his cares and troubles for a time at least. The argument that drinks and drugs, when moderately used under medical advice, are good for the human system has been exploded long ago and had been given up. Only this argument of drowning of cares remains. This argument, if pushed to its logical conclusion, is the same as justification of suicide. Whereas drinks and drugs help a man to drown his cares and sorrows only for a time, drowning oneself liberates him from all cares and sorrows for ever. Yet nobody agitates for the repeal of laws against the attempt at suicide. If we give up all our selfish interests and care only for the welfare of the Indian masses, we cannot but come to the conclusion, that the Prohibition Policy of the Congress Governments is an un-mixed blessing and that it is the duty of every right-thinking man and woman to heartily support it.

WIDOWS' ESTATE.

(By K. B. Gajendragadkar, Pleader, Satara.)

The Hindu Women's Right to Property (Act XI of 1933) popularly known as the 'Deshmukh Act' has given to the widow the status of a coparcener in the family and has now radically altered the order of succession as it stood before it. The old rule that the widow succeeds to a man's estate in the absence of the male issue has been altered by making a widow heir to his property along with his son, grandson and great grandson where they are in existence. The widows of pre-deceased sons and of pre-deceased sons of the predeceased sons are also entitled to succeed along with the male issue. But the estate to which the widow is entitled under this Act is the Widow's Estate. The widow's estate, it must be remembered, gives rise to endless complications. There are difficulties concerning alienations by the widow and the rights of alienees, intricacies surrounding reversioners, problems of law of divesting when an adoption takes place and questions as to whether one reversioner represents the other for the purpose of litigation.

Large estates, moveable and immoveable, are locked up during the lives of widows, without affording stimulus for commercial enterprise. A Hindu Widow's estate is at present a result of an unnatural compromise between the rights of the widow herself, of the reversioneer, of the alienee from the widow and of the son adopted by her. The jurisprudence knows about an absolute estate and of an estate for life. But this unnatural combination which has given to the widow just for some purpose an absolute estate and for others merely a life estate, has been at the root of all the trouble and litigation relating to women's property. The legislature, therefore, must in fairness amend the present Deshmukh Act by providing that the estate which devolves upon the widow along with the son in the family should be her absolute estate like the Stridhan.

The proposal, if carried out, would greatly diminish the volume of litigation in the country that gathers round the widow's estate. It would also give her a fairer and more assured position consonant with the modern notions of justice and in line with the other forms of personal law. As a widow would get a definite share in the husband's property as her absolute estate a great number of suits now brought to set aside the alienations by her or restraining her from alienating the property are got rid of at a stroke. That branch of law which set out the purposes for which the widow may alienate and for which she may not, becomes unnecessary. At the present day no sane person would purchase an estate from the widow if he can help it. He knows for certain that there is bound to be a litigation. In order to secure a decent title he makes other male relatives join in the same, which leads to fresh complications as they set up claims on their own account to the property. By the amendment proposed as a widow has a definite share she has a free hand in dealing with it. The law relating to devesting and the assent of the sapindas goes overboard and another fruitful source of litigation is avoided. The widow can still adopt a son but the adopted son will inherit her property only when she dies and not, of course, deprive her of it when she is still in the flesh.

THE KHAKSAR MOVEMENT.*

(By Amiya Chakravarty).

In Ichhra, a suburb of Lahore, in the Punjab, is the red-brick headquarters of India's seven-year-old Khaksar movement, which now claims four hundred thousand followers. Hot dust blows in the lane; clerks in uniform sit outside, sorting newspaper files on little benches spread near the entrance; in an outer office-room great business prevails. A few yards beyond, villagers gather in a grocer's shop, flies settle down in clouds; sluggish traffic, mainly of Muslim residents, flows through winding alleys dominated by the red flag with crescent emblem on top of the Leader's house. The Leader himself, Allama Innayatullah Khan, Al Mashriqi, a tall figure austerely clad in khaki, red insignia of brother-hood stitched on to coat's right arm, stands welcoming you at his doorstep.

Seen in this setting, his commanding figure signifies work for the people around him, making them use the belcha, the Spade, for digging living soil. This spade, you feel, will also be applied one day to clean up the suburb of Ichhra, orphaned by the city fathers, and incidentally to remove the open drain in front of the Khaksar Central Office. But protesting senses are soon forgotten as you enter the Leader's room and share his confident sympathies. With quiet eagerness he explains the plan and purpose of the Khaksar movement—Khaksar literally means "earth-like"—warning you that he is now collecting bricks, lime and mortar, so that to discuss the complete edifice would be irrelevant. His three young boys, immaculately dressed in uniform—the eldest is studying in England—come saluting while their little spades, made in Birmingham, glitter.

Emblem of earth-work, the Belcha stands for newly recruited zeal among the army of middle and lower-middle class converts to the Khaksar movement. This movement does not invite agrarian workers as such, evading the recruiting of poor peasants. Self-financing recruits are of more value to the movement, and less burdensome. Martial preparedness is insured by those who can parade with an easy economic conscience and run camps with private purses. Gradually the villages will be included in the organization: groups spreading from towns are already founding "cells" for rural work and for military ends.

"Militant, but not military," corrected Innayatullah. "We do not train for violence. Bayonets and machine guns are solely support for the weak. Strong men may not need them. Work, discipline, units of organized workers, team work of units; coherence in India under a spiritual banner!"

As for his relationship with the Indian National Congress or the Muslim League, Innayatullah refused to define it; he had satirical and patronizing words for both, according to circumstance. But communal violence he condemned bitterly. Racialism has never touched the Khaksars. None of those rumoured Fascist traits here—though parades multiply and mock fights produce casualities. How, I ventured to ask, would a strenuously organized service such as he envisaged, compare with Communist planning?

"Communism?" he queried, "But Communism is a part, not the whole. Sometimes I think that the Soviets have torn a leaf from the Koran and applied it. But they cannot see that you miss truth without the whole. Islam supplies religion as well as service; planning, but planning with a spiritual purpose, not merely planning for physical needs."

I keep to his exact meaning, even if my language varies slightly. The Allama Mashriqi—"Wise Man of the East"—speaks vigorous English, has humour and, in moments of will, a terse epigram at his command.

"India needs Dictators," he declared. "She must find them. How can you save people who will barter away their rights, fight in communal camps, be slaves of their own land? The Benevolent Dictator can use force on them for their own good. Educate, unite, organize; who but a Dictator can deliver the goods, in a thousand-jointed, lumbering country of divisions, indecisions, fanatic follies!"

But to answer this with another question: how to insure a supply of Benevolent Dictators? Democratic machinery is imperfect but improvable, more terms of reference, if seldom used, are there. Miraculous leaders, even if faith produced them, would make people wait on miracles. Modern miracles, when dropped from above, demand splinter-proof shelter; one must guard against them.

"Democracy indeed! Foreign democracies, you sitting on our chest and enforcing their own democratic blessings on India. Let them! So long as we are not awake, they will supply leaders—at plenty. But the leaders might as well live in our land, spend their money here, build permanent homes in India, not "suffer banishment" and return home after well—paid matyrdom. That would be sanc for them. For us, the same course—but what is the use of talk? Have you seen our parades?"

Constitutional government holds few charms for the modern East; India watches nations professing noble abstract principles and practising diplomacy. Fear and trembling, says eastern disillusion, betray the democratic conscience, but these symptoms are being produced less by spiritual imperatives than by "Gassolinis" and "Battlers." Hit back. How does the Spade work? The Belcha movement, apart from its religious and social aspects, is a hit-back parade.

"Talk and world-opinion," declared the Allama, in a second interview, "did not save Abyssinia. Anti-sanctionists, for their part, did much talking, and expressed their opinion also."

"I collect bricks and lime and mortar," he repeated, "for the building." Not only for building barracks, one hoped.

Now we come to the story of the Leader's career, which should throw some light upon the matter of the foundation of the structure he is building.

Mohammad Innayatullah Khan was born at Amritsar, on August 25, 888. His father, Ata Mohammad Khan, a devout religious scholar, was known for his intercommunal sympathies. An early welding of Islamic faith with scholastic discipline, an affluent but rigorous home and contact with many social groups gave Innayatullah the necessary background for future leadership. The classroom and school sports provided adequate outlet for his exceptional talents during adolescence.

His early career is marked by scholarships and academic distinctions. Graduating from Forman Christian College, Lahore, in 1906, he took his M.A. degree, topping the list in first class when he had barely passed nineteeen. Followed five years at Christ College, Cambridge, where he secured a B. O. L. degree for Arabic and Persian, and a B. Sc. (Honours) in Physics; he also took the Mechanical Science Tripos, B. E. (Honours). Literary and political interests were not abandoned; he contributed articles to British papers and was a correspondent of the Empire Review. On his return to India he became Vice-Principal of Islamia College, Peshawar, and in 1916 was made its Principal. From 1917 to 1919 he was Under-Secretary to the Government of India Education Department, and he also entered the Indian Educational Service.

Details of his career provide background for the sudden break that was to follow and do something to answer the query: How does a successful, brilliant, steadily advancing educationalist jump from his official trapeze, landing safely and dramatically on a religio-political platform? Conversion, whether of saint or fervent leader, is always a mystery, and the clues offered as a rule vary with the disciple. The main actor, or rather the author of the particular drama, generaly has a simple answer which is never stated because it is so much a part of his own make. A house-painter starts repainting the maps of Europe according to a crude colour-scheme; the village black-smith hammers out a maniacal empire; kings leave their crowns to pursue shining ecstasy; disappointed love turns a brooding Florentine youth into a torchbearer of paradisiacal visions. Glandular theories, Marxist reconditioning, fate, rebirth, change of diet and magnetic influence have been requisitioned to explain mystico-political transmutation for better or for worse. Here, modestly, a well-placed scholarly official's change into deliverer of ultimatums and leader of Spade-brigades has its own mystery-door. Many keys have been rattled—one of them being simple disgust with the bondage of red tape and dreary dossiers. The last straw, some aver, was the British Government's breach of promise with regard to the Caliphate, which violently offended the entire Islamic world and in 1920 led to the Hijrat movement in India. Large numbers of Muslims migrated to Afghanistan, some never returning to India. This, says a Khaksar pamphlet, was authentic provocation, and adds that to win back Innayatullah's confidence the Government offered Knighthood and an argosy of silver and gold only to be answered with a "No" and preparation for "action." More important than literal veracity is the fact that rumoured tradition accepts this theory. In 1920, also, Innayatullah published the first part of his magnum opus, calling it, "Tashkara."

Tashkara "The Story" was to reveal Islam for man. History, culminating in that supreme religion, would show civilization as a series of variants on recorded finality. The Koran, he explained to me, is also Science; it shows truth as facts. Thus, one surmises, he came to the idea of the Belcha, the Spade; truth-diggers would remove the mound of centuries, uncovering Islamic reality. The encrustations that had gradually been built up through long years of priestcraft would be carted away. All religions must be respected, but Islam, being Religion, must guide all domains, spiritual, domestic, juridical. Recognized by authorities as an important interpretation of Koranic principles, this book is meant by the author to be a blue-print for the application of immutable laws. The complete structure of man's story is there; seeing it clearly, civilization cannot go wrong.

Another book, Isharat, "Signals" published some years later, maintains the high level of the author's learned musings, and formulates his reformist programme. His polemical writings, mainly directed against the moulvis, or priests, have created enemies and, naturally, won him many friends from the non-priestly groups. These pamphlets are often virulently worded but are proof of social concern, and based on fundamental Islam. The fatwas, or religious decrees, issued by the orthodox, calling Innayatullah Kafir, or infidel, are easily understood but unjustifiable.

The year 1926 found Innayatullah in Egypt; he attended the Khilafat Conference in Cairo, and then travelled in Europe. Germany he knows best of the continental countries, and an interview brackets him with the Fuehrer in 1929. The Spade, asserts Innayatullah, came to the Nazi Labour Corps after his own Khaksars had adopted it. Rumours again, and this time from a different quarter, find something Nazi Germanic in the Khaksar drills and stunts and its inscrutable leadership. Critics should, however, gratefully note race-freedom among Khaksars, and their acceptance of religion.

Before resigning his post in the Government of which he is now an avowed opponent, Innayatullah had travelled widely, made contacts and become well known. By the middle of 1932 he was his own master, and could therefore claim followers. The Khaksar movement had started.

Summarized, the fourteen points of the Khaksar movement, as incorporated in its vows, are as follows: (1) A world social system built on tolerance should be established. (2) Islam means early Islam of the Holy Prophet. Khaksars cannot follow any example but that of his life. (3) The religion of the moulvis, or priests, is false. Khaksars would uproot it and re-establish Islam. (4) Khaksars do not believe in moulvis. (5) Khaksars do not favour or oppose any Muslim religious sect. (6) Khaksars will act upon the Koran and the Hadis (savings of the Prophet). (7) Khaksars believe in toleration towards Hindus, Sikhs and Christians; are ready to give assurance that their cultures are safe. (8) Khaksars aim at winning civil liberties for every community and are prepared to make alliances with all. (9) Khaksars aim at world conquest and will, by good acts, win prestige and establish superiarity of this nation over others. (10) Khaksars will build up a Baitulmal, or Treasury. (11) Justice is supreme and must be observed. (12) Trade must be practised and improved. (13) Associate Khaksars will contribute six pies a month or one rupee a year to the Baitulmal, and will be ready to make any sacrifice at the order of the Idara Ilya Hindiya. (14) Khaksars are opposed to all those leaders, editors and others who exploit the nation or relations between Hindus and Muslims. They will avenge themselves; if necessary, at any cost.

LABOUR EMIGRATION TO MALAYA.

Mr. Jainullabdeen of Kuala Lampur writes to the Hindu.

The Indian merchants in Malaya view with concern if not with alarm the continuance of the ban on labour emigration to this country. When the Government of India used its reserve powers to stop emigration to this country under the Indian Emigration Act it was believed that by so doing the employers in this country would be forced to raise the scale of wages to a level which prevailed in 1937. Experience has shown that in spite of its application for well over a year, it has not produced the desired result. It was thought last year even in supposed well-informed Indian circles in this country that the planters in Malaya would not be able to work their estates up to the mark without Indian labour. This has not proved to be correct. Visitors to Java, Sumatra and Ceylon countries which produce rubber, copra, tea and palm-oil like Malaya, have testified to the fact that the wages here are higher than those paid to labourers employed in the same classes of industries in the respective countries.

How is it then that the stoppage of emigration from India which has been vigorously in force (as some of the employers in mercantile firms, clerks, interpreters in the Government service have to hamper if not to paralyse the estates on which Indians were exclusively employed? The reasons for such a result have to be sought in the fact that a great volume of emigration of women has taken place since the war with the result that there is now on all estates a large population of families with young children. A part of this class of people who went back to India during the great slump reported that their children could not live in India under changed conditions. As a result the Indian families now prefer to stay in Malaya even though wages have slightly fallen, because in their minds they are so much higher than what they could earn in India. They are afraid of absence in India of continuous employment suited to them. To the planters in this country the Indian labour is no longer indispensible which is easy to understand on a slight reflection. The fact is that the Chinese workers are no longer taboo on estates. In recent years there has been a large influx of Chinese women into Malaya partly owing to stoppage of Chinese male immigration and partly owing to chaotic conditions in China with the result that there is a large number of Chinese families. These Chinese are very different from those Chinese who work under Chinese contractors on estates and mines and are easily tractable ahd obedient. They are just as easy going as the South Indians and ask for easier work, cultivating vegetables and rearing pigs and poultry during their leisure hours.

The European planters are no longer averse to employing this class of Chinese labour. They loathed the Chinese labourers who worked for contractors on estates and in the tin mines on account of their indiscipline and general rudeness of behaviour. Nowadays it is a common spectacle that when an Indian leaves his job on the estate as a labourer his place is generally given to a Chinese family. This process of gradual substitution takes business out of our hands entirely, for no Chinaman would buy goods from an Indian estate-shop if he could help it.

Apart from this aspect of the question which affects Indian traders not only on estates and other places of employment and also even in Government service, the Indian labourer is at a great disadvantage as compared with his Chinese fellow-worker. While the latter can leave Malaya and return to it by virtue of the passport which they are allowed to take with their photographs attached, the Indian labourer is precluded from leaving by the Indian Government. As can be expected many labourers would like to see their near and dear relations and friends in their villages, but their Government would not permit them to do so as they are allowed to return to Malaya. In happens in a good many cases that labourers desire to leave their wives and children on estates here, but that the manager is not disposed to keep the wife and children as the husband will not be able to return. This places the Indian labourers in a very awkward and difficult plight.

As one sees things here it does not seem that Malaya would need new Indian labourers. A large ingress of such people would tend to lower the wages-level and the standard of living. We cannot help feeling that the labourers who are in Malaya and who have made it in their heart of hearts their home, and who desire to come back to Malaya after a short sojourn to their motherland should be allowed to do so, just as the Indian Government permit merchants, doctors, lawyers, clerks, shopkeepers etc., to return to Malaya. If they cannot do so, their places will be filled by the Chinese and other class of labour, which would ... ously handicap the trade which is now in the ha... of the Indians. This would have its repercussi... on the shops in the towns with the result that ... Indian trades will be ousted from the Mala... market which they have held for many long ye... and which affects our businessmen in India conne... with Malayan trade.

I strongly appeal to the Madras Government in ... name of the Indian merchants in this country ... the question of labour emigration to Malaya ... reviewed carefully and justice done to the return... labourers as well as the Indian tradesmen who ca... in the wake of the emigrant. PROF. JOAD ON THE GOSPELS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

As Prof. Joad's allegations were being adequate... met, I did not mean to add anything myself, but ... seems a little more may be said before the subje... is closed. The fact is, Prof. Joad's criticisms a... old fashioned and out of date. All this ground ha... been gone over in years past; by his own shewing... also he has made no careful study of the question.

First, as Mr. K. Chandy, in his good letter, remark... sagaciously, "It is impossible for any person howeve... scholarly to understand the sayings or doings o... any great mystic or psychic, unless the scholar hi... self has some mystic or psychic gifts."

The simile of the "ear for music," will add force t... this remark. A person will have an ear for musi... or he will have none, it cannot be acquired. To ... the musically gifted, music can afford an inexpres... sible pleasure, even ecstasy; to the unmusical it ... is just a noise, and can never be anything more. ... There is nothing within him to respond to it. ... Prof. Joad belongs to a school of modern ... thought that some one has designated "sentim... mental materialism." Having not a spark of ... spiritual intuition, they make up for it by a ... superfluity of sentimentalism, (not to be confounded ... with sentiment), and in some cases, superficially ... observed, a kind of mysticism; but dig into it, and ... all that is found is a bewildered materialism. Such ... are Bertrand Russell, Aldous Huxley, Bernard Shaw, ... H. G. Wells, and others.

Another consideration must be taken into account. ... Modern theologians do not trouble to endeavour to ... reconcile discrepancies, elucidate obscurities, or ... explain passages in the Gospels which are completely ... un-characteristic of all that Our Lord stands for. ... They remember that his words had reached us ... through mediums broken and faulty, and channels ... devious. May not the obscurest of the passages be ... so because they have been wrongly reported, or the ... context which would have explained their meaning ... has been entirely omitted? But there is enough as ... clear as the light of the sun for us to found our ... Faith upon.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

NOTES.

Emigration of Unskilled Labour:—The Working Committee of the Indian National Congress at its meeting at Wardha endorsed the action of the Government of India in banning the emigration of unskilled labourers to Ceylon, while expressing gratification at the good understanding created as a consequence of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's visit to that country. The Ceylonese should appreciate the action of the Government of India and the attitude of the Congress Working Committee as it is in line with their professed desire to be self-sufficient in the matter of employment. We say "professed" because a young Ceylonese who is studying in one of the Bombay Colleges, when asked if the plantations would suffer from the ban, at once replied, "No, we shall import Chinese labour." It will be unfair to take the opinion of this young man as representing the general opinion among responsible leaders in Ceylon. They surely know that to substitute Chinese for Indian labour would be no benefit to their people. But it is significant as showing that in one at least of Ceylon's youth who will no doubt play a part in his country's affairs, the idea of his own people taking up the plantation work when Indians cease to be recruited, did not occur as an immediate or natural probability. Most of the problems relating to Indians overseas, certainly the most vexatious of them, are due to the emigration of unskilled labour from India. It is also responsible for the low opinion formed of Indian culture and civilization in foreign countries. The word "coolie" has passed into many languages as an opprobrious epithet. India should therefore stop sending out unskilled labour any longer. The only country of importance to which it will go, when the ban in respect of Ceylon becomes fully operative, is Malaya. Indians in Malaya are never sure of their employment and constitute a source of permanent anxiety to the mother country. They are likely to be packed back to India when conditions are depressed in Malaya when they are also likely to be depressed in this country. With the large industrial developments in contemplation in Madras and the South Indian States from which unskilled labour mostly emigrates, it will be necessary to retain all the labour supply in the country itself, so that by prohibiting its emigration we are not only helping Ceylon and Malaya to rely on their own labour force but are appreciably diminishing our responsibility for our people abroad.

End of Hyderabad Satyagraha:—It is now several months since three organisations started satyagraha, that is, enrolling volunteers to court imprisonment by breaking some Police order in the Hyderabad State. They were the Hyderabad State Congress, the Hindu Mahasabha, and the Arya Samaj. At an early stage, the State Congress withdrew from the field for fear that it might be confused with the two other agencies which were communal and religious while it was political, its object being the attainment of full responsible government. The Mahasabha and the Arya Samaj continued their campaigns in such close formation that the distinction between them (analogous to that between the Calvinist and the Catholic) was completely obscured. The advent of the Shankaracharya of Jyotirmath on the scene dispelled this happy illusion. His Holiness's presence served to remind the Sanatanists that they were doing no good to their religious interests by allowing the Aryas to pose as their leaders. The Shankaracharya drew up a scheme for the better protection of Sanatanists and he expressed full confidence in the desire of His Exalted Highness and his Government to redress the grievances of Hindu subjects. Incidentally, he called attention to the fact that Hyderabad was the only State in which cow-killing was prohibited during the Id. His Holiness' mission paved the way for the prompt acceptance of the Hyderabad Reform scheme, as soon as it was announced, by the President of the Hindu Mahasabha, Dr. V. G. Savarkar. The Arya Samaj leaders found themselves left in the lurch. They have now followed the Hindu Mahasabha and disbanded their satyagrahis, on the ground that the statement by the Nizam's Government, issued in response to their request to 'clarify' the position as regards their religious freedom, has completely satisfied them. There is nothing new in the statement which the Nizam's Government had not stated several times before. The State Congress satyagrahis have not yet disclosed their attitude to the reform scheme.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Caste and Conversion:—We publish on another page an important judgment of the Madras High Court bearing on the readmission of repentant converts to the Hindu fold. In this case a Hindu of the Balija, a section of the Vaisya, caste, was converted to Christianity when he was thirteen years of age. As he grew up to manhood he was drawn more and more to the ways of the old religion. His caste fellows accepted him and his family as equal members. But there was no formal reconversion to Hinduism. On this ground two lower courts had held that the man should be regarded as having been a Christian at the time of his death. The High Court (Mockett and Krishnaswami Aiyangar, J. J.) overruled the lower courts. Mr. Justice Aiyangar observed that, in matters affecting the well-being and composition of a caste, the caste itself was the supreme judge and, if the caste had thought fit to give up old notions and practices and adopted new ones not in any way repugnant to morality, such new usages would be respected. His lordship went on to observe:

> The Court could not shut their eyes to changes almost revolutionary in character and in extent, which had been for a considerable time past taking place in the structure of the Hindu social order and in the ideas and sentiments which governed it. The old sanctions seemed to have disappeared sweeping away before them the old faith in old institutions, which did constitute in the past an integral condition of the indigenous social fabric. In view of the new forces at work, it is no surprise, their Lordships observed that as early as 1903 the Privy Council refused to permit a departure from the orthodox standards in matters of diet or ceremonial observances, to affect the status and civil rights of the erring individuals.

The Madras High Court has long enjoyed the reputation of being most conservative, not to say narrow, in its interpretation of Hindu law. Mr. Justice Aiyangar's observations are on that account all the more important. His plea that the Court can not shut its eyes to the revolutionary changes which have taken and are taking place in the Hindu social structure and ideas, is very sound and opportune. In the matter of admission of persons who are not Hindus to Hindu castes, considerable latitude has come to be recognised and to prevail. The other day, an eminent Hindu lawyer and scholar was telling us how in his city—a stronghold of orthodoxy—several European girls married to Hindus, are recognised as natural members of their husbands' castes, and their children have found no difficulty in getting married within the Hindu fold. This sort of thing has become common all over the country and Mr. Justice Krishnaswami Aiyangar is perfectly right in holding that the Courts are bound to take cognisance of these changes or they would become a deadweight on the normal life of society. Mr. Justice Mockett delivered a concurring judgment. No farce of a conversion or reconversion is needed to establish that a person has resumed his position as a member of the caste or community which he had left, if the community accepts him and makes no discrimination in social relations with him on the customary basis. This applies also to newcomers, we should think. A new custom has thus been formed and the rule that custom overrides the written law, operates.

Secret Voting and Civil Liberty:—We publish in this issue the second and concluding part of Mr. Srinivasa Sastri's remonstrance against imposing political disabilities on teachers in aided schools in the Madras Presidency, as contemplated by certain draft proposals of the Madras Government. One of these is that teachers should maintain perfect secrecy as to how they vote at elections. Secret ballot is the legally established mode in Indian elections. The Government proposal implies that the law is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Otherwise there is no need to make a special rule for teachers. It is the fact that the secrecy of the ballot box is a myth. Mr. Srinivasa Sastri plainly says so. Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar in his address at the Madras University on which we comment in the leading article, points out that the secrecy in elections is a farce and advocates open voting as being both more honest and democratic. He said:

> The secret ballot is only a concession to human weakness. But it facilitates corruption and the receipt of bribes from both the rival parties or either of them and by no means makes for a manly democracy. Nor is it at all certain that it always ensures secrecy or a choice uninfluenced by intimidation. In actual practice in this country the average voter informs the candidate or his agent beforehand how he is voting and after voting tells him and others how he voted. Reticence in this respect does not appear to be a common Indian characteristic. Separate ballot boxes of different colours and other polling arrangements in the booth to help illiterate voters, detract from the secrecy of the ballot. On the whole it is doubtful whether the secret ballot suits Indian conditions and in any case its advantages are exaggerated.

Mr. Sastri in his paper expressed surprise that teachers' associations had not come forward to protest against the proposed encroachments on their civil rights. More than teachers, journalists may be supposed to be jealous of infringements of freedom of speech and writing. In Bombay we have had the unique experience of members of the Executive Committee of a Journalists' Association which has repeatedly in the past protested against acts of the Executive Government against newspapers, throwing out a resolution condemning the recent ban on six newspapers by the Bombay Government. The fact is that there is no real appreciation of civil rights as such even among the more politically-minded of our people. It is significant that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu who has been the President of the Indian Civil Liberties Union since it was pompously launched into existence by Pandit Jawharlal Nehru, has felt obliged to refuse re-election. No doubt she had several other reasons but the general absence of respect for Civil Liberty among Congressmen generally, and even among Congress Governments, had surely some influence in her decision to withdraw from appearing at the head of an organisation to protect and advance Civil Liberty.

Educational Deputation to Japan:—By a piquant coincidence, a deputation of Indians interested in educational problems, has left for Japan a week before Pandit Nehru's projected visit to China. This is an entirely non-political mission as its composition shows. It is led by Dr. Rallia Ram, General Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association for India; and Mr. S. K. Rudra, Rector of Allahabad University, Mr. Suryanarayana Rao of the Servants of India Society and Mrs. Rukmani Lakshmipathi, Deputy President of the Madras Legislative Assembly, are other members. Mrs. Lakshmipathi is a prominent worker in the Indian Women's and in the Congress movements. The high efficiency of the Japanese educational system with its low cost to the State as compared with the Indian system, evoked the admiration of the then Principal, Mr. W. H. Sharp, of the Elphinstone College who wrote a monograph on Japanese Education for the Indian Bureau of Education after an official visit to that country. That was several years ago. Early this year, Mr. Harold Butler, late head of the International Labour Department of the League of Nations, in a paper read at the Institute of International Affairs, London, attributed the ability of Japanese products to compete successfully with those of her competitors, not as often alleged to State bounties, but to the efficiency of Japanese workers, which he traced to the excellent education which they received in the Japanese elementary and secondary schools. We are sure that the present Mission will bring back valuable impressions which will be of considerable assistance in shaping Indian reform. Particularly at this juncture when the whole of the Japanese population is under a severe strain on account of the War in China, it will be interesting to see how the educational system reacts to the national crisis. By the way, Dr. Rallia Ram had an unpleasant experience in Bombay where he stopped for a day on his way to Colombo to join his colleagues. He was arrested at Victoria Terminus for having in his possession half a pint of brandy. Himself a lifelong total abstainer and a member of the All-India Prohibition League, he was naturally much annoyed by this episode. The Bombay Prohibition rules allow a non-permit-holder to have a pint of brandy for medical use in emergencies. Surely what is allowed to a resident of Bombay is not an offence in one who is passing through the city. Happily the Magistrate took a commonsense view of the matter and acquitted Dr. Rallia Ram with some pungent remarks against overzeal in performing official duties. Dr. Rallia Ram's annoyance was aggravated, while his luggage was being searched by Excisemen for liquor, by a C. I. D. man rummaging it for Nazi literature, owing Dr. Rallia Ram suspected, to his luggage bearing a label with Japan marked as destination!

The Status of ACTORS:—In his article this week entitled "Growing Tendencies," Mr. J. M. Ganguli contrasts the present tendency to welcome actresses and theatre performers into society with the past practice of excluding them and relegating them to an outcast status, to the advantage of the old custom. In his condemnation of the glorification of stage and cinema stars, Mr. Ganguli loses sight of the evils of setting up or forcing on actors and actresses a separate caste. Nor does he attach adequate weight to the other side of the question, the advantage of respectable men and women taking to the stage and screen and ridding public entertainments of their grosser elements. Even the evils are greatly exaggerated. Whatever happened to Mary Pickford and the Poet in London, we do not think that it is likely to occur in this country.

The Tientsin Surrender:—The four Chinese suspects in Tientsin whom the British authorities had refused to hand over to the Japanese in the earlier stages of the Anglo-Japanese negotiations, have, it was announced last week-end, been found guilty by the British on prima facie evidence and the decision had been taken to hand them over to the Japanese. It is significant that the decision was arrived at immediately after Parliament adjourned for two and a half months. The position of the suspects is worse even than it would have been had Britain handed them over as soon as Japan asked for then. For then at least there was no need for British representatives in the Far East to have declared on the guilt or otherwise of the suspects.

Is England a Democracy?:—In our leading article last week we quoted M. Andre Siegfried's query, Is England a Democracy? A partial answer to it, is furnished in an article in the New Statesman by Mr. Tom Harrisson headed "The House of Uncommons." He refers to Simon Haxey's recently published "Tory M. P." as demonstrating beyond any doubt that, as far as the Conservative Party is concerned, the Reform Acts have hardly altered the basic system of plutocracy, government by those who have inherited wealth. "The Labour Party is dominated by another type of business director, the Trade Union official, who is often as far removed from ordinary workers, (the majority of whom are still not in unions) as Earl Winterton from the loyal conservative butcher. Apart from Trade Union leadership, the dominant Labour M. P.'s today (in contrast to the lost leaders, MacDonald, Snowden and Thomas) tend to wear old school ties or to come from the old universities...The leadership of Labour today is farther than it has ever been from the masses."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, August 19, 1939.

DEMOCRACY AND INDIA.

The suitability of Democracy as a form of government to India, was the subject of two important pronouncements last week. Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, an ex-President of the Indian National Congress, devoted his address under the Right Hon. Srinivasa Sastri Endowment in the Madras University, to a comprehensive survey of "the problem of Democracy with special reference to India." On the same day, Sir Shanmukham Chetti, Dewan of Cochin, delivered the inaugural address at the Intermediate College Association at Bangalore, covering nearly the same ground. The coincidence of the dates is rather important as some parts of the addresses would seem to be intended as replies to each other. Both the distinguished lecturers were agreed that Democracy was suited to India. But the Democracy which Mr. Aiyangar visualised as the best suited to this country was different from that which Sir Shanmukham favoured. For instance, Mr. Aiyangar was strongly against the two party system as destructive of the democratic principle and out of tune with Indian conditions. Sir Shanmukham, on the other hand, held that the two party system was essential to the working of parliamentary democracy. Then, again, Mr. Aiyangar condemned communal representation as incompatible with democracy. Sir Shanmukham, on the other hand, maintained that democracy can not function in India unless it recognised the existence of communities. We have selected these two points not only because of their importance but also because of our own predilections. We agree with Mr. Aiyangar and have repeatedly pleaded against the party system of politics. We agree with Sir Shanmukham that, situated as we are, a democracy which ignores the communal divisions of our population is not workable in this country. The two party system has not succeeded in any country except Great Britain and even there, as Mr. Aiyangar pointed out, it has ceased to be anything more than a shadow. That it is not essential to democracy is evident from the fact that it does not obtain in France which is more truely a democratic country than Great Britain. In his article on "The French Democratic Tradition" in Foreign Affairs (New York), Mr. Andre Siegfried observes :

> For two centuries the civilized world has recognised the English system as an admirable model and has done its best to imitate it. With no great success, one must admit! The English system is the system for the English and (as conceived by that insular people) never pretended to be anything else. England has all along worked for herself, not for the other peoples in the world. By a marvellous adaptation of her institutions to the peculiar circumstances in which her people live—to her climate, one might almost say—she has solved the problem of combining a maximum of freedom with a maximum of order under law.

The comic result of Kemal Pasha's attempt to reproduce the British system in Turkey is well-known. This French writer who is a great admirer of the British system, is inclined to deny the name of democracy to it. We refer in an editorial note today to an analysis of the composition of the present House of Commons by Mr. Tom Harrisson in the New Statesman showing that the "people" are very poorly represented among the members.

With every free people the State, the political organ, must be continuous with and correspondent to its social structure. The English system has its roots in and has grown up with English society. So must the political constitution of India. Now, the outstanding feature of our population is its division into communities which from ancient times have been allowed and, indeed, encouraged to live their own autonomous lives. Until recent times this did not lead to any serious diagreements among them. On the contrary, by assuring each of its culture and religion, and racial integrity, it has been possible to ensure a very remarkable degree of good fellowship and neighbourly feeling among them. Sir Shanmukham declared,

> During the last eighteen years of my public life I have given serious thought to the study of the communal question as an integral problem of our political evolution and I have come to the conclusion that it is only when you get the courage to face the inevitability of the problem in the existing social order in India, that you can make any political advance in India.

Approaching the question from a sociological standpoint, we are definitely of opinion that the existence of Indian communities testifies to the wisdom of the ancient policy of religious and social toleration. A community in India, broadly speaking, differs from another in having a conception of Deity and a form of worship peculiar to itself. Belief in God and religion is thus the basic factor. When this belief is at its purest, the result is peace and harmony among all men. It is the corruptions that have crept into it that are responsible for its becoming the source of strife. In fact, it is no exaggeration to say that a man's faith in his religion is often in inverse ratio to his zeal for communal politics. Here we have a straight indication of the method in which communal differences may be harmonised. The present tendency is to have a purer belief or to have no belief. In either case political communism is a vanishing factor. The alternative of "economic interests," on the other hand, cannot be turned into a harmonising influence. Economic interests are inevitably the most fruitful sources of conflict. In the Middle Ages Christianity was a uniting factor and Christendom was a fact. The Industrial Age brought with it economic nationalism, the full fruits of which we are experiencing only now. Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar doubted if a system of functional representation would tend to eradicate communal differences. "It may even," he added, "accentuate them by creating communal divisions in each economic group." We rather think it would by imparting economic acerbity to the communal division which by itself is both natural and innocuous. We are not pleading for the perpetuation of communalism as it has come to be today. The true goal is the brotherhood of man. We think that it is easier to reach that goal from the communal than from the economic line of approach. Once you get the Indian people to think of the economic as the prime motive, you set them on the direct road to protetarianism which may be good or bad, but which certainly few thoughtful Indians would wish to see done.

Pandit Nehru's Visit to China :—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru is too upright a man to allow personal gratification any weight in determining his course of action in public affairs. Yet it is difficult to discover what other purpose would be served by his visit to China in response to the invitation of several struggling Associations in that country at the present time. Though the Pandit himself, as he says, may regard the visit as a purely personal one, the impression in China and abroad is bound to be that he goes there as representing Indian, or at least Congress, opinion. We do not know what the opinion is in Congress circles but so far as informed opinion in this country is concerned, we think that it is decidedly in favour of India abstaining from meddling in a complex international situation to which she has no means of making any effective contribution. The complexity of the question can be easily illustrated. The United States being prevented by the conflict between the President and the Congress from taking an active part in the Far East, Great Britain is the only Power on which China can rely for assistance against Japan. It is this fact that has aroused considerable anti-British feeling in Japan. Pandit Nehru is an inveterate opponent of British Imperialism. Will he suppress his cherished convictions and comport himself in Chinaas the supporter of that Imperialism? Obviously he will be doing no service to the Chinese nationalists by proclaiming his antipathy to British Imperialism on which they chiefly rely for support in their conflict with their powerful neighbour. True, Soviet Russia is also helping the Chinese against Japan and in a few days she may become an ally of Great Britain in Europe. Pandit Jawaharlal has a platonic sympathy for Sovietism. Since Russia is a friend of China and Britain is also another, the Pandit may modify his attitude to British imperialism on the mathematical postulate that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other. There is another consideration. Japan professes to be fighting for the independence of Eastern Asia from European domination. Of late she has been laying more stress on this aspect of her operations than on the urgent need for her overflow population to which all other doors are closed by the all-White policy of her pacific neighbours. Alone among Asiatic nations she has mastered the military and industrial technique of the West and is showing herself an adept. Is India prepared to join hands with these who would penalise her for it? The Pandit, by the way, will be going on a British passport and under the protection, now not very certain, of the British flag.

Mr. Bose's Excommunication :—Twenty years ago a man was outcast if he went on a sea voyage or dined with another who had married a widow. The purohit would not officiate at marriage and funeral ceremonies in his family. In the villages, he might find difficulty in procuring the services of dhobis and barbers. His women would be insulted if they went to a tank to bathe or to a temple to worship. In one or two cases within our knowledge, threats of personal violence and actual violence was a part of the programme. Times have changed. Excommunication is now very little in vogue. Reformers had their own priests or performed the ceremonies without the aid of a priest as every Hindu is competent to do. Gillette and others relieved them of the tyranny of barbers. Mechanical washing did the work of orthodox dhobies more quickly and effeciently. We seem, however, to have outlived the era of religious and social persecution, only to slide into one of political ostracism. The old custom has taken a new form. But we have not the least doubt that political excommunication will be no more effective in stemming the tide of freedom than social persecution has been. The Congress organisation today is an exact replica of the sectarian caste organisation. Those whose life-work has involved a constant challenge to caste and sect, can not lightly regard this new phase of the same old evil. Mr. Subhas Bose who had in his early youth come under the influence of the Brahmo Samaj and Swami Vivekananda, is not perturbed by the papal bull from Wardha. Besides, he has himself been President of the Congress and knows it for all it is worth. He has expressed his determination to tread the path which he has chalked out for himself. Compliance with the dictates of the men in authority might have brought him peace and popularity. There are conspicuous examples of persons who have preferred this easy path. But Mr. Bose can not find peace in that way. Easy acquiescence has been the bane of Indian history. The country wants men who dare to say "No" to temptations from within and allurements from without. Mr. Subhas Bose has dared to say "No." However embarrassing it may be to Gandhiji as Congress boss, it cannot but gladden his heart as one who holds that not institutions but character—in the ultimate analysis the power to say, "No"—makes a people great.

TEACHERS AND POLITICS—II.

(By the Hon. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri.)

There are all sorts of rumours in the air, but we are not justified in believing them. One, however, is very persistent and widespread. It is to the effect that the teachers in a certain district on the West Coast as a rule have been affected with extreme socialistic doctrines, and that they have sometimes held out a threat even to strike. If a body of teachers in one place have deviated a little from the line of propriety, it is certainly not necessary to take away the right of taking part in elections from the whole profession without a word being said.

It was said that teachers in aided schools, being dependent to some extent upon public money, are to be treated in the same way as teachers in Government service, in Municipal and Board service, because all alike receive public money. I do not object to Board teachers getting this privilege, Municipal and Board teachers being placed upon the same footing in respect of right to candidature. As to the teachers in Government service, there is perhaps a wider consideration, and it may be impolitic on the part of the Government to choose one set of employees and give them a power which is denied to another set of employees. Amongst Government servants there must be equality, and that is a higher principle. But I am quite willing that between Board teachers and us in aided institutions there should be complete equality.

Then it is asked, "Why should teachers go and interfere in these public matters?" Have they not enough to do in their schools and with pupils? That is a particularly undemocratic view to take. We are all citizens of our country. Not only are we citizens but we are expected to raise the citizens of the future. Those who raise citizens, must themselves be citizens.

Again, it is asked: "Why should teachers come at all into those legislative bodies and into the Municipal Councils? It is true you had this privilege once, when education was not wide-spread and there were not enough workers to take up public work. Now we have a plethora of competent citizens for all the tasks of democracy." If this is so, it is due to our labours. Is it fair to shut us out of the world which we have ourselves helped come into being?

It has been pointed out to me that the South Indian Teachers' Union has among its aims the obtaining of pensions from Government, of a large increase in salaries, of better leave provisions and so on, in other words, it seeks large ameliorations in the conditions of the profession. Representations to this effect have been made to Government before and it is felt that, if at the same time we cling to this privilege of candidature, to vote, it might be thought that our claims were mutually self-destructive and we were really weakening the force of our demand.

I am in entire sympathy with the teaching profession. Their present condition is to be deplored. They should get better salaries, better leave conditions and they should be in fairly comfortable circumstances at the end of their service. But we in Madras are famous in the whole of India for having developed the grant-in-aid system to perfection. It is in this province that Government has the least direct share in the furtherance of education. It is in this Province that collegiate and secondary and primary education are dependent largely, in fact very largely, on the existence of private but aided effort. If we are to go back upon this and seek to provincialise ourselves, it follows that Government cannot maintain the extensive field in education which it now occupies. Government will be obliged to contract in a very great measure the educational operations going on in this Presidency. We must be content to go without a great number of colleges and schools and private institutions. Now are we, who clamour loudly for the extension of compulsory education and for the further extension of the facilities of secondary education, for the reduction of school fees and college fees, the throwing open to the poor of these institutions by means of more scholarships, are we justified in demanding these things from Government and also demanding that the whole service of education should be provincialised?

I think we ought to be clear about our position. Much as I sympathise with the disabilities and hardships of the teaching profession, much as I should like that in many directions these conditions were improved, I am not in favour of steps which would amount to a provincialisation of these services. It is the greatest disservice we could do to a poor country which is putting itself in the way of democratic development.

Next I should like to say a word about secret voting. Why should our teachers be specially told that the voting must be done secretly? I suppose in all our text-books upon democracy the secret ballot is held up as one of the principal aims. But are teachers the greatest offenders in violating this rule of secret voting?

Is it that the teacher by declaring his vote will turn the fortunes of candidates at the polls? We know how men of the highest education belonging to University electorates give their voting papers to the candidates either unmarked or partially marked; we know how well and widely established a practice this is; yet how can we countenance a measure which tells the poor teacher, 'It is on you that the responsibility of establishing the secrecy of the vote must rest.'

Then we are told that the Director of Public Instruction may call upon a Manager to dismiss a teacher. I almost tremble to think how it will work out. The Director knows few teachers in person; his numerous Inspecting Officers will therefore be the means of conveying news to him of how at elections, when by the way the Congress has numerous candidates along with other political parties in the country, certain teachers in this school or in that school used their influence or took part in the electioneering. It is a new terror added to the life of the teacher. But we are told we are not to misunderstand the motives behind this rule. The motive may be good, but nothing has been said in public about the object of these rules and how they will be worked. Some people say that it is for the protection of the teachers themselves that these rules has been framed. Because they have this right of candidature, of electioneering and of voting, unscrupulous managers who themselves take part in these elections, use the teachers as their agents and instruments.

We are all grown up people, we have taken our places in a profession, we know the risks of public life and we vote and we take part in electioneering and we stand as candidates like men erect, knowing our rights and privileges and the way to protect ourselves. If some simple people amongst us, a few weak persons here and there, are victimised, it does not follow that the whole lot of us should be deprived of the rights that we are enjoying. Nor do I see how this will be a protection. Unscrupulous masters will always find employees to be at their beck and call.

It has been pointed out that, if Government are unfortunately not persuaded to change these rules, teachers might ask that they should be formed into a separate constituency with a certain number of seats in the Legislature, Municipality and other bodies. That is, a teachers' constituency should be created for the purposes of these elections. Now gentlemen, it looks attractive on a superficial view, but I think it is thoroughly unsound and at the same time undemocratic. Are we to imitate Hyderabad? We ought not to have occupational constituencies; our electoral system is already vitiated by the introduction of constituencies to represent several interests like landholders, merchants, etc. Let us not have a teachers' constituency. We do not want to be isolated from the main body of public citizens as though we had interests of our own which we could only protect by forming a trade union. I think we teachers must not fall into a narrow groove. We must keep on the highway of citizenship.

If our Government went back and recaptured for a moment the spirit of May 1933 when they introduced those other rules, we might see the disappearance of these rules from the code of education.

But what is the profession doing? It is some time since these rules were published in the Gazette and the papers. It is astonishing that few voices have been heard. The Trichy Teacher's Guild has just passed a resolution. If the profession do not show that they want these rules to be abolished or drastically modified, no Government will voluntarily do it.

I am no longer a member of the teaching profession. I am not affected by these rules. Nevertheless, I have great respect and great affection for the teaching profession, to which I once belonged. Whatever tends to increase its welfare has my most sincere sympathy; whatever threatens to contract the honour and usefulness of this body, whatever threatens to stamp upon it the mark of inferior citizenship, whatever seems to stain its character in any way, I deeply resent.

NO "REPRESENTATIVES" OF CONGRESS ABROAD.

Propaganda which is being carried on in foreign countries by some Indians, who purport to act on behalf of the National Congress, has come to the knowledge of the A. I. C. C. Office. Steps are being taken by the General Secretary to stop and counteract it. Propaganda of this type is stated to have secured publicity in an American paper named the Kansas City Star when His Majesty the King visited the United States recently. It appears, it was given out in that paper, that a message had been sent from London that the headquarters of the Indian National Congress in Allahabad, India, had issued instructions to the "Indian Branch of the Congress in New York," not to participate in the official or non-official receptions and demonstrations given in honour of King George VI or Queen Elizabeth. It is also learnt that some Indians style themselves as non-official representatives of Gandhiji or as "non-official ambassadors of India or the Congress" in foreign countries, one of them being America, to exploit the situation. The A. I. C. C. office has taken serious note of this and adopted suitable measures to make it clearly known in all foreign countries including America, that no branches of the Indian Congress, official or non-official, exist anywhere outside the geographical limits of India, and no ambassadors of Gandhiji or the Congress are appointed in those foreign countries.

GROWING TENDENCIES.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

Not long ago there was a rather heated discussion in the Delhi Municipal Committee over the resolution of a member prohibiting dancing in cinemas. Such dancing is being increasingly introduced by money-making cinema managements as an additional attraction for their customers. That the resolution was opposed was not surprising, in view of the loose tendencies which are visibly spreading among the educated classes; but, when one member stood up proudly to assert that such dancing was a part of cultural life, many an uncultured thinker must have felt stung into a sudden realisation of the fast-moving times in which he was living. The culture-seeking member went on, with no less animation to add that, in places like Calcutta, nude dancing was a common feature of stage entertainment, a statement which is news—at least to the backward uncivilized denizens of Calcutta.

But, whether the above reference to the Calcutta stage be true or not, it ought to provoke serious thinking in all well-wishers of society, because of the light it throws on the mind of its educated members. While one reads this exposition of the view of culture, as held by many educated persons, of whom the above municipal councillor is not an uncommon type, one reads also of hundreds of university students invading a cinema-hall in Allahabad for forcing their admission thereinto without tickets to witness the dancing of a star. This woman had previously been invited by the students to address them on her art, and at that meeting she had invited them to the cinema to witness her performance—without buying tickets or so they concluded. The Proctor of the University, who was called on to the scene, did not consider it his duty to find out how the trouble arose. What he did was only to interview the actress and the cinema manager to effect a compromise, without expressing serious disapproval of the conduct of students in seeking admission without tickets, and for their unseemly eagerness to see the performance. A reprimand or an expression of disapproval with an unqualified refusal on principle to associate himself with such an affair as a compromiser, might have displeased the students and made him unpopular with them; but it is not for an educationist always to humour students and seek their popularity, but to teach them high moral and ethical principles, and to tell them the truth, even if that be harsh. It is by so doing that he really discharges his duties and trustful responsibilities towards his students. rather than by merely teaching them some books and texts.

However, the incident shows which way the current wind is blowing the educated mind. Not that dancing girls were non-existent in this country a generation and more ago or that they were not engaged for performance in marriage and other merry functions. Their public contact with society was confined to such functions. Their status in society was not such as to give them free and uncriticisable access to respectable society, much less to a students' gathering. Under the influence of the present day non-puritan and easy self-satisfying civilization, actors and actresses in the West, have been accepted into society, and are even given elevation in status according to the degree of their entertaining ability. The mad eagerness of the London public to see Mary Pickford, the film star, when she went there (for the first time probably) so much surprised Poet Rabindranath, who happened to be there at the time, that he was led to wonder what that civilization was worth, which paid so much attention to an actress, who could only pose and affect attractively before the public.

The higher and the purer a civilization tends to be, the more womanhood is raised in people's estimation, and women are less regarded as creatures for dancing, singing, acting and posing with sex appeal for public amusement and entertainment. Naturally, therefore, women who depart from that pure conception of womanhood to take to these things, lose public esteem in a civilization freed from animality and based on high moral standards, and are relegated to a position in the social order, that is distinctly marked off from respectability and common acceptability. It was for such reasons that actresses and dancing girls in the Orient could not emerge out of their distinct corner to pass off unmarked in society at large.

Unfortunately, there is an increasing number of people in India now-a-days, who with much noise and vigour criticise the apparent 'injustice' and 'cruelty' done by society in thus outcasting them; but if they would have the patience and calmness to deliberate over the matter they would at once see that by such outcasting society had, in fact, paid high respect to womanhood and had at the same time wished the outcastes well by condemning their tastes and tendencies and by suggesting to them, though indirectly, a return to higher ideals of womanhood.

There is another class of critics, who call and think themselves to be art lovers, and who bring dancing, stage-singing, acting, etc., under art, and ask what sin there can be in such art. Art, no doubt, there is in acting, in staging, in singing, and even in voluptuous dancing and lascivious posing, just as there is art in everything. Once a man, coming to know that his brother was killed by a person, went with drawn sword to take revenge; but at the sight of his brother's dead body, cut neatly into two pieces across the chest along his sacred shoulder-thread, he was so charmed at the skill of the assassin that he forgot himself and congratulated the killer of his brother on his fine stroke of sword. There was art in that fine sword thrust. In its wide and liberal sense art is, in fact, in all kinds of skill, whether in good or in bad things. But to construe it in such unqualified and extensive sense will mean losing the higher import which good people in all ages have given to it, and according to which art is that which appeals to higher and nobler instincts, instincts which distinguish humanity from animality.

But what about the art of acting and dancing girls? Shorn of its sex appeal, what can such art stand for? And what will its value be when judged from the point of view of art's higher sense mentioned above? To one unsusceptible to such base appeal such art is charmless. Even its enslaved admirers will not be without sticky hesitation to assert that such art kindles noble sentiments and divine inspirations, and makes them not look upon the artistes with lustful eyes and desire-full mind. They may argue to the contrary, but they will not thereby convince a psycho-analyst prying into the depths of their mind.

If that be so, feminine stage performance that excites animal cravings and prevents us from looking reverentially on womanhood ought not to be included within art in its purer sense and women who take to such art should not be accorded the admiration and ovation that masses and educated people in the West are now-a-days giving them. Women who prefer to trade in that art for monetary gain or for mere hunt for the popularity of uncontrolled and principle-less people must be prepared to remain outcastes, unqualified for the free social contact and for marriage and other relationship. That is the way to discourage them from going off the ideals of womanhood, and to restrain young folk from running madly after them.

WOMEN IN INDIA.*

(By Mrs. A. Asaf Ali, Delhi.)

Had this account of the women of India and the rise of the Women's Movement not been meant for an American and European public, the hurry and haste evident in most of the chapters might have been overlooked. As it is, one cannot help regretting the somewhat vague and loose style in which the writers have expressed themselves, because it gives one the impression of a scrappily compiled series of newspaper articles rather than of a book with a definite plan.

Kamaladevi's interpretation of the man—woman relationship as outlined in the opening chapter is an attempt at tracing its historical background. The scientific approach to this problem is to study it in its anthropological aspects instead of treating it as a strictly economic problem, and it would have been better if specific Indian customs like Purdah and Child Marriage had not been brought in by way of illustrations of social degeneration, since this particular chapter was meant to be a survey of a universal nature.

While no one will entirely disagree with Kamaladevi that the women who are leading the movement for social reform and the removal of their legal and other disabilities belong to the bourgeois class, her own admission that "the working class women, both industrial and urban, are comparatively freer than the upper class women in India," accounts for the stress on the problems and hardships peculiar to the women of this class. The working class and peasant women can not depend on a women's movement as such to redress their primary grievances. Their problems are predominantly of an economic character and can be dealt with by only those who are working for fundamental changes in the political and social framework. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that, however unreal and ineffective the women's self-appointed task of eradicating social maladies may appear to politicians, it is definitely related to most of the important problems and handicaps of the women workers of India.

Most of the contributors who have dealt with particular facets of the Indian background, seem to have taken it for granted that their audience is well informed about its main characteristics, whereas the average American and European still think of India as a land of rajahs, elephants and aborigines. To make our culture and our problems intelligible to the West it is essential that writers should bear in mind the confusion of ideas about India that prevails abroad. To inspire respect they must adopt an objective attitude and avoid self-praise or emphasising our helplessness.

The effort made by the author and her colleague is, however, creditable because so far very little attention has been paid to the task of acquainting the West with facts about Indian women and their outlook on life. It will certainly go a long way to educate those who are eager to know how thinking women are approaching their problems.

INDIA AND THE WORLD: A PLEA FOR UNDERSTANDING.

(BY N. LAKSHMANAN, COIMBATORE.)

The venerable C. F. Andrews has gone round the world, thrice, as an Ambassador of India. During his recent world tour, he found in country after country that anti-Hindu literature was spreading like poison. In East and West alike, his friends requested him to check this growing menace to international goodwill and friendship. Even in Oxford and Cambridge, Indian students urged him to write out a simple and constructive book that might state in a brief compass the real truth about Hindu morals and religion. "The Hindu religion itself has been the centre of the attack .....The replies that were published in India had only a small circulation, and therefore the misunderstanding has remained. India's own case has very nearly gone by default." Friends of India all over the world are quite familiar with his writings and they will certainly be glad to read his book on "The True India, A Plea for Understanding" just published by Messrs. George Allen and Unwin, London (price 3sh 6d. net). By this timely publication, Mr. Andrews has rendered a valuable service to the cause of international friendship and goodwill. He is best fitted to do this kind of "spiritual red-cross work."

The book is dedicated to Poet Rabindranath Tagore with deep affection. Mr. Andrews is approaching his seventieth year, and half of his life-time has been devoted to India, the land of his adoption. "If I had my life to live over again," he says, "I would wish to spend it once more in India." (p. 220). He has been in intimate contact with Tagore for more than a quarter of a century now. Tagore opened "my eyes both to the deeper meaning of Indian culture and to the singular beauty of the lives of the simple villagers.....Tagore knows and loves Indian village life best of all, and his simple songs will live on the lips of many generations of the country folk long after other memorials have perished." (Preface). Curiously enough, many of our friends who dabble in rural reconstruction are in blissful ignorance of the fact that Tagore is a pioneer of the rural reconstruction movement in India.

Mr. Andrews gives a beautiful illustration of the inner meaning of Ahimsa or Non-violence. "Sometime ago, at Santiniketan, I had been in the habit each morning of plucking a few white, scented blossoms and giving them to Poet Rabindranath Tagore, for his writing-table before he began his day's work. But his daughter said to her father, 'Why does he pluck the flowers when they are growing in the sunshine? Tell him not to do so. God gives us the blossoms when they fall. Let him gather those for his morning gift to you! They will provide you with the same beauty and perfume." Mr. Andrews adds by saying that this deep sentiment, that does not wish anything, however humble, to be sacrificed to man's need, is one of the noblest things in Hinduism. (p. 201). Dr. Albert Schweitzer has described in his Autobiography (p. 185) how when making his way through a herd of hippopotamuses, there flashed upon his mind, unforeseen and unsought, the phrase, "Reverence for Life." Mr. Andrews remarks that this is a motto which has been current in India for more than two thousand years (p. 186).

Tagore has been stung to the quick by Miss Mayo's mischievous books on India and her people. He himself happens to be one of those whom the American tourist had "selected as a target for her midnight raid." He was cleverly misquoted by Miss Mayo as supporting the custom of child marriage. Mr. K. Natarajan, in his well-known booklet on Miss Mayo, had discovered her literary offence and verified Tagore's sentence in Count Keyserling's Book of Marriage. "That she was determined to discredit the poet is evident." Tagore says: "For my own defence, I shall use the following extract from a paper written by Mr. Natarajan, one of the most fearless critics of our social evils." The extract is given on pages 39 and 240. Mr. Andrews has also met others whom the authoress has misrepresented in the same inaccurate manner. He institutes a comparison between Miss Mayo's notorious book and Mrs Stowe's novel and concludes that later history has shown that, where the picture drawn in Uncle Tom's Cabin was highly exaggerated, it did mischief. "The wound inflicted on the Southern States has not yet been fully healed." The author reminds us of A. O. Hume's reply to B. M. Malabari given in Wedderburn's personal Memoir (A. O. Hume p. 150).

The facile accusation of "phallic" worship in Hinduism is examined with a vast background of historical knowledge. The author's conclusion is similar to that of Bishop F. B. Fisher's illuminating chapter on Sex in India in his great book "That Strange Little Brown Man, Gandhi." While Fisher explains the erotic sculpture of some temples of Peninsular India, Mr. Andrews is uncompromising in his condemnation of some of these Temple carvings, for, according to him, they are a sign of diseased imagination and not of health (p. 75). Mr. K. Natarajan himself refers to these erotic carvings in his book, Our Trip to America. Dr. J. B. Pratt in his book called India and its Faiths also deals with this intricate subject and holds that phallic symbols are common all over the world. Gandhiji says that in India, as elsewhere, these symbols have lost all sexual significance. Millions in India "are unaware of the obscenity alleged to be behind it" (caste-mark) p. 34. Thus the argument, advanced by Mr. Andrews, in this and similar topics, is clinching and comprehensive."

Like Dr. J. B. Pratt, Mr. Andrews says: "I have watched Hindu women making their offerings at the wayside shrines, or near the river bathing ghats, whose faces were like that of a Madonna. It would be impossible to associate obscenity with such faces as these." (p 75). Writing from direct knowledge, the author says that the Devadasi system is a gross evil which is actually encouraged by debased religion.

Public opinion, backed by legal powers, is setting its face against this degenerate system. As for untouchability, "Educated India is endeavouring rapidly to cast out once and for all this pernicious evil in the same way that it is attacking purdah and child-marriage.

Mr. Andrews wisely insists that all these evil and outworn customs need to be exposed. "Yet in order to get a true picture we must turn also to the deeper bedrock facts which are practically undisputed. The facts are these: that whateve, excrescences have intervened to sap its vitalityr whatever evil customs and traditions have spread like a creeper over it, the tree of Indian life is still sound at the centre." P. 76.

SIR N. N. SIRCAR TO PREPARE REPORT ON INDIAN WOMEN'S DISABILITIES.

The League of Nations has been engaged for some time in preparing a comprehensive memorandum on the political and social disabilities of women of different countries of the world. So far as India is concerned, with the approval of the Government of India, the League approached Sir N. N. Sircar, ex-Law Member, to undertake the task. It is understood that he has accepted the invitation.

TEMPLE-ENTRY REFORM.

The Editor

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Opponents of the Temple-Entry movement come under different categories. In the first place, there are the venerable persons who strongly feel that the question of the Harijan uplift should confine itself to the economic uplift. They believe that religion invests a sort of divine sanction on the existing social order and arrangement in virtue of which they are considered too sacred for rearrangement. They will not realise that if we are to improve the economic condition of the lowest stratum of a society, leaving aside the spiritual, we should wait till eternity, unless in the meanwhile a sort of communism is bolstered up. Secondly, there are opponents of the temple-entry movement who express intellectual appreciation of the reasonableness of the reform, but who believe that the reform will come about by wise preaching and patient propaganda by the elect of the land. This class of people are against any legislative enactment for changing the outlook among the people. Their moral inertia will not allow them to offer a constructive policy to satisfy the aspirations of the generation now coming to maturity.

One main reason why the bureaucracy was forced to concede political reforms was their belated and woeful realisation that in the sphere of social administration, further progress depended on the assumption by Indians of real responsibility for social conditions, and that under responsible government alone can it be attempted with any prospect of success. The attempt to continue the existing social inequality on the basis of the guarantees in the Queen's Proclamation is bound to be futile. In a nation aspiring for democratic sovereignty public opinion will soon find its way into the legislative forum; and the invocation of the legislative machinery for speeding up the pace of the lethargic section of the community or for bringing round an obstinate and untractable minority is justified as proper and legitimate in all democratic states. Having recognised the justness of the reform, we should not shirk the responsibility; mere intellectual appreciation is of no avail.

Now, the measure recently initiated by the Madras Government has raised a newer class of critics. These esteemed persons accept the inevitableness of the force of the legislative sanctions, and would be satisfied if a referendum is adopted, and if a majority of worshippers agree to the reform; but they object to the process of ascertaining public opinion. They consider the substitution of the Government consent for the consent of the majority of worshippers duly elicited, as unsound and undemocratic. Their criticism has gained strength on account of the fact that the Governor's aid was invoked for promulgating an Ordinance. The lay public have ever been used to associate the Governor's and the Viceroy's Ordinances as weapons used for the purpose of overruling legislatures or superseding Ministers or enabling them to escape responsibilities which properly belong to them. Hence an alarm has been raised that Fascist methods have been used by the Congress Ministry.

Even a cursory perusal of the chapter on the Provincial Executive in the Joint Select Committee Report should convince this class of critics that the Premier has only sought to realise the objectives of the Congress by utilising the powers inherent and vested in the Act of 19[illegible]. Adequate discretionary powers have been conferred on the Governor, "primarily in order that the Executive as a whole may possess the authority which experience shows to be essential to the success of Parliamentary government. The strong executive with the whole body of the Governor's reserve powers, may well prove the most effective guarantee for the development of a genuine system of responsible government. To magnify the legislature at the expense of the executive is to diminish the authority of the latter and to weaken the sense of responsibility of both. The function of the Executive is to govern and administer; that of the legislature, to vote supply, to criticise, to educate public opinion and to legislate; and great mischief may result from attempts by the latter to invade the executive sphere." A strong executive, supported by a disciplined party, may co-exist even with an omnipotent legislature. The last chapter on the working of the democratic forms of government is yet to be written. Even the referendum, like the initiative, is after all one means whereby the methods of direct democracy are adapted to representative government; and is but an imperfect and rough, though ready, way of ascertaining public opinion. Persons who do not object to the referendum method, need not raise a hue and cry over the novel procedure proposed by the Premier; for the trustee's sensing public opinion is safeguarded by the responsibility of the Government. My submission is that no democratic principle has been sacrificed. As the Joint Select Committee observe, "Indians should not be misled by deceptive analogies with the constitutional practice of the United Kingdom. Responsible government postulates conditions which Indians themselves have still to create." The Premier's achievement as a constitutionalist deserves praise.

Again, apprehensions are raised that the reform will ring out the old, but may fail to bring in the new, and that the old worshippers might go out, and that the new worshippers might not come in after all. Our ancients had the wonderful power of accommodation; and the temple-shunners of today will soon harken back to the temples to seek the message of reborn Hinduism in its resurgent glory which will afford daily solace to the lowly millions, and not merely to the cultured few. A powerful reply has been given by Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar in the pages of the Bharata Dharma in 1934; and I shall quote a few sentences from his articles:—

"The evil will not happen. Our country will react and live; it will not refuse to react and live. Newer ideas and appropriate changes are in progress. They cannot be prevented. God does not choose to withdraw into oblivion anything of value for the time and place. Time spirit is described as Vishnu in the Purana that bears His name. Vital reactions of a suitable character are willing submission to His purpose and aid in His work. We have shown this submission in the past by making necessary changes. Please do not, in your worst anger and vexation with heretical friends, get obstinately confirmed in the idea of 'no change,' whatever the cost, even if it be decay and death of Truth with a capital T. The broad stream of life will make its own path and flow on."

Let me conclude with a very appropriate quotation from Mr. V. V. Srinivasa Iyengar's speech at the second South Indian Musical Conference:—"Orthodoxy is everywhere only a safeguard; and progress and improvement can be attained only by the push and the urge of liberals, reformers, and radicals."

THE COMMUNAL PROBLEM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I welcome your comments on my letter about the "Reformer and the Communal Problem." I have always noted with pleasure that The Reformer has not that fascination for joint electorates which lures the Congress to agree to the destruction of the very basis of nationalism itself. What I have not been able to understand is The Reformer's support of the occasional communal unity parleys between the Muslim League and the Congress. Is there any doubt now in the minds of reasonable men that these parleys are intended to bribe the Muslims by weightages and privileges to accept joint electorates?

The Reformer's advocacy of the principle of entry into the services on merit and merit alone is worthy of all praise. But what the readers of The Reformer want it to recognise is the fact that this principle is as dead as dodo in all parts of India. The Hindu politicians in Muslim provinces only plead that the principle (if it is a principle) of entry and promotion in the services on the communal ground should not operate in totally keeping out the Hindus. It is cruel to characterise their efforts as calculated "to violate every principle of administration." That is what I wanted to protest against. I shall be a proud man if I can take the theoretical glasses from off the eyes of The Reformer and make it see the communal problem as it really is. Then perhaps from its detached position it can suggest a solution. The on-looker sees more deeply into the game than those who play it. To-day we do not get the requisite guidance from The Reformer. Take Sir Sikandar's proposal for an Indian Heptarchy. The Reformer's leading article on it is disappointing. Why the creation of the 'zones' and the weakening of the Central Government? Even the Statesman has had something to say against weakening the Centre, a point not touched upon at all in The Reformer's leader.

Delhi,
August 8, 1939. } Yours etc.,
B. BANERJI.

[We are unable to find out when The Reformer supported Muslim-Congress discussions for political unity. Mr. Banerji understates the case when he says that the Hindu politicians "only plead" that communalism in appointments to the services should not "operate in totally keeping out the Hindus." We would refer him to Mr. H. L. Mehta's original article out of which the letters of Mr. Banerji have arisen. Mr. Mehta wrote (The Reformer, July 15, 1939): "So far as Hindus are concerned instead of geting any weightage to which they are entitled as a minority, they get about 25 per cent in the services, which is below that to which they are entitled on a population basis, their population being according to the 1931 Census figures about 26·32 which figure itself is wrong." As for Sir Sikandar Hyat Khan's scheme, if Mr. Banerji had read the first comment of The Reformer immediately after Sir Sikandar's exposition of it at a Bombay Rotary luncheon, he would not have fallen into the error of inferring that The Reformer's attitude towards weakening the central Government was doubtful. We refer Mr. Banerji to The Reformer of July 8, which remarked in an editorial note, 'If the Punjab Premier follows the trend of events in countries where the rights of component units are being rigorously safeguarded, he will find that their constitutions are strained to breaking-point in order to meet the pressure of World forces.....The history of India shows beyond doubt that the country had prosperity within and security from foreign invasion, only when she had a strong Central Government and that when it weakened or allowed the provinces to grow stronger than itself, the country was plunged in anarchy." On July 15 we again protested against the "Centre being dominated by the circumference." In the very article read by Mr. Banerji we wrote "the length of the coast-line has nothing to do with the constitution of a Federation except that it favours a strong unitary Central Government as against an impotent figurehead to which it is reduced in Sir Sikandar's scheme." —Ed., I. S. R.]

BRAHMO SAMAJ MARRIAGE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Lord Chancellor announcing the decision of the Lords' Committee on Lord Sinha's application for a seat in the House of Lords has said that one of the tenets of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj seat was monogamy and the Indian Courts would not recognise the validity of a second marriage while a person continued to be a member of that sect and his first wife was alive. This statement of the highest judicial authority, it is submitted with great respect, appears rather strange. The Sadharan Brahmo Samaj is a sect amongst the Hindus like the Arya Samaj and the Prarthana Samaj. The Hindu Law is applicable to the members of these sects among the Hindus and it does not certainly recognise the religious tenets propounded by the founders. The Courts in British India, therefore, would not hesitate to recognise the validity of the second marriage of any member of these sects even when the first wife of that member is alive. The Brahmos are as a rule monogamous. There is no doubt about that. But it should be noted that, if a Brahmo married a second wife when his first is alive, the Courts in India would recognise the second marriage as valid. The tenets of the Arya Samaj too included strict monogamy; but now-a-days polygamous marriages are performed under the Arya Marriage Validation Act and the authorities of the Samaj seem to be absolutely unconcerned. Will any Brahmo throw more and clear light on the statement of the Lord Chancellor?

QUESTION OF RECONVERSION.

Their Lordships Mr. Justice Mockett and Mr. Justice Krishnaswami Iyengar delivered separate, but concurring judgments in a first appeal raising the question whether a convert to Christianity could, without performing a formal and expiatory ceremony, come back to Hinduism and to Hindu law.

A suit was filed for the partition of the estate of the late G. Appalasami of Gopalpur in the District Court of Berhampur. The defendants in the suit were the four sons of Appalasami by his first wife and the plaintiffs were two sons by his second wife.

Appalasami was originally a Hindu, who became a convert to Christianity at the age of 13. In 1898, his marriage with the first wife took place according to Christian form. Appalasami drifted towards the old faith and re-entered Hinduism, but there was no formal ceremony of any kind. In 1930 he married a second wife, while the first wife was alive. The sons of the second wife filed the suit for partition of the estates of their father.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The suit was dismissed by the District Judge on the ground that the marriage with the second wife was invalid according to Christian law. Though the family adopted the customs and habits of the Hindus, there was no formal re-conversion to Hinduism and therefore Appalasami must be deemed to have continued a Christian. Against this decision the present appeal was preferred.

His Lordship Mr. Justice Krishnaswami Iyengar observed in the course of his judgment that it was extremely doubtful whether the ancient Hindu law and the text-books on Smrithis permitted the return into the Hindu fold of an apostate, who had wilfully and deliberately chosen to abandon the religion of his birth and become a convert to an alien faith which held the Hindu religion in contempt. Apostasy was a sin, which was probably regarded as not capable of condonation or expiation by mere Prayaschitic performances. No Hindu law texts were cited before Their Lordships as governing the matter or tending to throw any light on the question. In fact, the examination of the few cases bearing on the subject had left the impression that the consideration of the topic had to be approached, not from the point of view of strict religion or of ancient lawgivers, but on a fair appreciation of the current sentiments and usage of a particular community to which the convert sought re-admission.

After referring to the facts of the case, His Lordship observed that it was obvious that it was scarcely likely that Appalasami embraced Christianity out of any religious conviction. His age at the time and his life and conduct afterwards, seemed to suggest the contrary. It was, however, undeniable that his outward bearing and habit from the beginning were more those of a Hindu than of a Christian. And as he advanced in life, he drifted more and more to his old faith, though it was difficult to fix any point of time at which he could be said to have definitely abjured Christianity, and reentered the religion of his forefathers. It was certain, however, that no formal ceremonies of any kind were undergone such as were sometimes resorted to in the present day, when a non-Hindu desired to become a convert to Hinduism.

The appellants' case was that the second marriage took place not in the Christian form, but according to the form prevalent among the Balija community and this was satisfactorily established. There was sufficient evidence to justify His Lordship in holding that the whole Balija community seemed to have accepted the entire family as still in the caste, and finally, when the members of that family died, they were cremated and "Brindavanam" erected over their ashes. There was no proof of any contact of Appalasami with the Church or the Padris after the marriage. The sons of the first wife were married according to the Hindu rites and customs. In his Lordship's opinion, it was difficult to conceive of a more complete reconversion to Hinduism or a clear abandonment of Christianity. The plaintiffs and their mother and other members of the family were received and treated by the entire Hindu community as Hindus without the slightest trace of any objection or dissent.

Referring to the observations of the District Judge, His Lordship observed that the reasons given by the District Judge in support of his judgment, namely, that society might get into a state of flux or confusion, if formal abandonment followed by performance of expiatory ceremonies was not insisted upon, were scarcely sound reason for the Court lending its support to maintain a social order, if the society concerned itself lost faith in it. His Lordship observed that matters affecting the well-being and composition of caste, the caste itself was the supreme judge, and if the caste had thought fit to give up old notions and practices and adopted new ones, not in any way repugnant to morality, such new usages should be respected. The Court could not shut its eyes to a change almost revolutionary in character and in extent, which had been for a considerable time past taking place in the structure of the Hindu social order and in the ideas and sentiments which governed it. The old sanctions seemed to have disappeared, sweeping away before them the faith in old institutions, which did constitute in the past an integral condition of the indigenous social fabric. In view of the new forces at work, it was no surprise, His Lordship observed, that as early as in 1903 the Privy Council refused to permit a departure from the orthodox standard in matters of diet or ceremonial observances to affect the status and civil rights of the erring individuals. His Lordship, in conclusion, said that there was no authority for the support of the District Judge's view that on account of the absence of a ceremony of reconversion or any other explatory ceremony the Court was bound to treat Appalasami as having continued to remain Christian and his second marriage was invalid.

His Lordship, Mr. Justice Mockett, agreed with his learned brother's observations.

In the result the appeal was allowed.

Messrs. B. Jagannatha Das and C. V. Dikshitulu appeared for the appellants and Messrs. C. Sambasiva Rao and S. Suryaprakasam for the respondents.

THE LEGAL POSITION OF THE ILLEGITIMATE CHILD.

The League of Nations has just published a short study on the legal position of the illegitimate child in the principal countries of the world, 15[illegible] pages; Price 4/- $1.00.

The study comes at an opportune moment, as the progress achieved in this field of social legislation during the last few years has led to a change in public opinion on the illegitimate child, which is being regarded more and more as the innocent victim of the irregular position of its parents. It is being granted certain rights bringing its position more into line with that of the legitimate child, or in the absence of such rights social measures are being enacted to improve its position.

The study opens with a short historical survey of the social aspects of the legislation on the subject in various countries. This is followed by an analysis of the various legislative provisions on the following points: civil status of the illegitimate child; [illegible] name, membership of certain communities, nationality and legal domicile; special measures to prevent disclosure of illegitimacy in official documents; re-establishment of the legitimate status of the child; inheritance rights of the illegitimate child.

The fate of the illegitimate child is closely bound up with that of its mother, though any social order founded on the conception of monogamous marriage imposes heavier penalties upon the unmarried mother than upon her child. No study of the legal position of the illegitimate child would be complete, however, without a chapter on the unmarried mother's rights including her right to maintenance.

The last part of the volume deals with social insurance laws (which, in many countries, are definitely favourable to illegitimate children) and with special social welfare measures, including public assistance and preventive health measures.

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Temple Entry Legislation:—The first Province to undertake legislation for removing the legal difficulties in the way of members of the depressed castes worshipping in Hindu temples, was Bombay. The Temple Entry Act enabled trustees of temples to open them to these castes after obtaining the sanction of a judicial authority. The rules framed by the Bombay High Court for this purpose were printed in last week's Reformer. The Madras Legislature some time later passed a law applicable only to the Malabar district authorising trustees of temples to admit antyajas if, on a plebiscite of the worshippers, a majority was found to be in favour of the reform. Following on the Indemnity Ordinance to protect the promoters of the Madura coup, the Madras Government brought in and have carried through both Houses of the Provincial Legislature, a Bill empowering trustees with the permission of Government to throw open their temples to antyajas. They are not required to ascertain by a plebiscite the wishes of the worshippers and they are not required to obtain the sanction of a judicial authority before adopting the reform. These two omissions met with sharp criticism in both Houses. Mr. T. T. Krishnamacharya in the Assembly subjected the Bill to a critical analysis and ended on an impassioned note warning Government that if, as a consequence of the Bill, there were any outbreaks on the part of the orthodox, their blood would be upon the head of Government. In the Legislative Council the Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry made a moving speech adjuring Government to move slowly in consideration of deep-rooted conservative sentiments. Mr. Sastry declared his sympathy with the object of the Bill. Differing from his friends, he said, he supported the use of the Ordinance-making power of the Governor by a popular Government, pointing out at the same time that indemnity acts were always passed to protect officials in the discharge of their functions, whereas in this case it was to protect private individuals who had, without the authority or the knowledge of the Government, incurred the pains and penalties of the law. Mr. Sastry urged that the agony that would be caused to thousands of men and women who believed in the established order, would be disproportionately in excess of the satisfaction which would be felt by the excluded castes by their admission to temples. He pleaded that the sentiment in favour of the reform should be allowed time to permeate the minds of the conservatives.

The Politician and the Reformer:—Hindus have shown themselves during the last fifty years that they are not blindly opposed to change and that all that they want is that those who believe in reform, should by their personal example prove to the satisfaction of the community that the reforms they advocate are wholesome and will inure to the benefit of society and will not prove to be detrimental to basic ideas of Hindu social and family life. Most of the reforms which were bitterly opposed fifty years ago, as will be found in the pages of the Reformer which begins its fiftieth year next month, have come to be accepted as a matter of course. The same method of example and persuasion will bring about the removal of untouchability. Here it may be pointed out that removal of untouchability will be real only when there are no castes regarded as untouchable; whereas the methods of the Harijan Sevak Sangh and the Congress are calculated to perpetuate the evil institution by according statutory recognition to the existence of a class of Harijans. The Madras Prime Minister rightly observed in his speech in the Legislative Council that the movement for the removal of untouchability was an ancient one. Gautama Buddha, Shankaracharya, Ramanujacharya, the medieval saints, and modern reformers, have all worked for this reform. No Hindu who knows anything of his religious philosophy can justify the continuation of this evil institution. It is today a survival which is without any roots in the moral and spiritual soil of Hindu society. Political and nationalist ideas have further shaken its structure. Social reform should begin in the home; leaders should set the example in their own lives. Mr. Rajagopalacharya admitted that there were many in the Congress who were not wholeheartedly in favour of his Bill. It is a curious fact that while Congress Governments are ready to resort to legislation for temple entry and total abstinence, they fight shy of demanding pledges from their party members that they would not drink and that they would in their personal lives deal with antyajas on the same terms as with other Hindus and non-Hindus. Radical reform in temple worship is a long-felt need. They must come from men filled with zeal for religion like the medieval saints of India and not from politicians. The best that politicians can do is to abstain from creating obstacles in the way of reformers by hasty and ill-considered attempts to force the pace.

Panicky Orders :—The Government of Bombay withdrew their orders of August 1, imposing curfew and other restrictions on the movements of citizens when they had been in force for hardly a week and that gagging five local newspapers after nine days. The reason given was that there had been no trouble in the interval. As a matter of fact there was no probability of any trouble. The Muslim procession was avowedly a demonstration on behalf of houseowners, the most law-abiding class in every community, against the 1) per cent sur-tax on immoveable property. At its head marched one of the five Indian Baronets, the only Muslim holding that dignity. The leaders had publicly stated that they were not opposed to Prohibition. We suspect that their real purpose in getting up the demonstration was to prevent the Muslims from swelling the Government pro-Prohibition crowds on that day. If this surmise is correct, the object was not altogether ill-conceived. The action of Government was almost entirely due to their own loss of nerve owing, no doubt, to the strain of the excitement into which they had worked themselves up on account of Prohibition. Credit has been claimed for the trouble having been suppressed in a single day. If our diagnosis is correct, there would have been no trouble at all if the authorities had acted with ordinary circumspection. The first duty of a government is, of course, to govern but, it is also true, to quote a famous saying of Cavour's, that any fool can govern a country in a state of siege. The incident, however, has not been without some use. It has thrown into high relief the utter demoralisation in the ranks of journalists, which was evidenced by the rejection of the draft resolution which we print elsewhere, by a majority of the Executive Council of the Journalists' Association last week. Two arguments were advanced by the members who opposed the resolution: that the Association existed for the object of advancing the interests of its members and that, as the ban on the papers was imposed by a popular Government, it should not be condemned. On both points the opposition was wrong. Foremost among the interests of journalism is its right of freedom within the ordinary law. This has always been accepted as a cardinal tenet of journalistic associations the world over. As for the second reason, if it be sound, there should be no inclusion of freedom of the Press among the fundamental civil rights embodied in democratic constitutions. The draft resolution, it will be seen, was temperately worded. Section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code under which the ban was imposed has never in our recollection been used against newspapers. Only last year the Government of Bombay repealed certain Emergency legislation thereby pledging itself against acts of an extra-judicial character in dealing with the Press. When the Official Secrets Act was wrongly applied against a British newspaper, the Home Secretary had to apologise and to promise that the mistake would not be repeated. We trust some member of the provincial Legislature will move in this important matter and that the Home Minister will have the grace to apologise for his precipitancy.

Listing Permit-Holders :—The Bombay Government issued to the press on August 4, the names of the first 175 Indian men and women who had applied for and had received permits for the use of liquor on account of their health. For reasons best known to them, the local dailies with one notable exception omitted to share their information with the public. It is likely that the newspapers considered such publication to be in bad taste. Fortunately the Bombay Sentinel did not share this peculiar squeamishness. For obvious reasons it is necessary that the names of those who are in possession of permits, should be available to the public. The Government had two methods open to it. It could, like the Police in the matter of motor registration, have kept a list of permit-holders at the office of the Prohibition Board and charged a small fee for every reference to it. Or it could, as it has now done, have released the names to the press. The second method has much to commend it. The licence-holder, for one thing, has not to prove his bona fides at every party he attends. In commenting on the attitude of Government House we remarked on the difficulties of arranging exclusive permit-holders' parties. This publication to a certain extent removes that problem not only for Government House but for all private permit-holders as well. Then, again, a dealer will know exactly where he stands. A permit-holder who holds his permit by reason of his health needs, must necessarily have been in the habit of imbibing his stuff regularly in the past. To do this he must have got his drink from a particular dealer. The dealer will, as he scans the published list, recognise his old customer, and note that the client will not be lost to him. We trust that after the list of Indian men and women, the public will also be told of the non-Indians who have received permits. The names already given must surprise many persons. Whilst the small number of permits seems to indicate a certain strictness in the issue of these personal concessions, the fact that some of the names recur twice in the list rouse the suspicion that some persons might have received two permits by mistake. On the other hand, the friends of many a permit-holder will learn with a certain anxiety of the health of the man or woman. The correspondent who in his letter to the local press accuses the Bombay Government of using Bolshevik methods in publishing the names of Indian permit-holders, makes two mistakes in his brief communication. The first one is his assumption that these men and women are opponents of Prohibition in principle. It is true that no European permit-holder can be a Prohibitionist. But this does not necessarily hold good of Indian permit-holders. It is possible but not necessary that a man's health and his convictions might lead him the same way. You cannot blame a man for his health. The second mistake lies in the comparison to Bolshevism. There seems not even the remotest connection between the two.

Germany and Islam :—About thirty years ago European writers on the Far East frequently remarked that the only factor which would make either China or Japan Christian, was a vague impression that the support of European powers would naturally be received by any Asiatic Christian nation. With a view to enabling them the better to adapt themselves to conditions in South America, the Japanese Government "converted" colonists to Brazil to Christianity before sending them out. No one could have dreamt that any Western power would reverse the process. Yet Mr. Elwyn James in "The Attack from Within," a recent Penguin Special, tells us of Nazi Germany's approach to Islam. "While synagogues have been burned in Germany, a mosque has been built in the heart of Berlin, where Muslims may perform their devotions... Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry professes to discover a number of points common to the Nazi creed of the sword and the teachings of the Prophet Mohammed. Not only has a school been opened in Berlin, where Muslim students are given free education and board; it has been decided to 'convert' 25,000 Nazis to Mohammedanism.....They will be sent into various Moslem countries as trade and political missionaries."

Britain and the Far East :—The British Prime Minister made a remarkable statement in the House of Commons before Parliament adjourned for its summer holiday. He said that his blood boiled at the humiliation to which British nationals were subjected by the Japanese at Tientsin but that, in view of their many commitments in Europe, the British Government were unable to protect the victims or to take effective action against the Japanese. That a British Premier should speak in such a strain has caused surprise in circles which have not understood the deeper significance of the speech. Mr. Neville Chamberlain was stressing the impotence of Britain in the Far East in order to impress on his people the importance of coming to a settlement with the European countries with whom they had differences as soon as possible, if they wanted to vindicate British prestige in Asia. The Japanese authorities have understood this and are pressing for a closer alliance with Germany and Italy. It will be imprudent on the part of Japan to rely too much on her European allies. Although for the time being, they are willing to make use of her as a counter-weight against the democratic Powers ranged against them, the moment they see their opportunity to come to terms with Great Britain, they will abandon her without a qualm and even side with Britain and the United States to extinguish their only Asiatic rival and competitor. Japan's interests lie in making a just and honourable peace with China as soon as possible. The two nations together can do much for the redemption of Asia. The Chinese too should give up their supercilious attitude to Japan as an upstart nation and learn from her the secret of material and military organization which has made her what she is today.

Parsis and Prohibition :—"A letter to the Times" is the Englishman's traditional means of ventilating his grievances. The importance of a letter in the Times arises to some extent from the fact that that newspaper is supposed to print only such letters as merit serious attention, either because of the importance of their writers or of the gravity of the questions with which they deal. Neither ground can be pleaded in justification of the publication of a letter in which Mr. N. M. Dumasia represents the Congress Party in this country as being inspired by sentiments of implacable hostility to the Parsi community in making Prohibition the main plank of its platform and adopting measures to enforce it in the Provinces under Congress Governments. The average British reader of newspapers is very ignorant of Indian conditions. But even he, we think, would perceive the absurdity of ascribing hostility to Parsis who are nearly all concentrated in Bombay, as inspiring a policy which covers practically the whole of the country. Parsi leaders and writers have done a great wrong to their community by making it appear that its prosperity is largely the outcome of the trade in liquor. The Beerage in England is not held in very high esteem. The extent to which it has penetrated the British Peerage has brought the latter into disrepute. The Prohibition policy of the Congress is the feature which has given it a high position among the world's social service agencies. To represent Parsis as the principal opponents of it, is not calculated to raise that community in the estimation of the world. If one of their leaders asks an English friend to tell him candidly what he thinks of the display of the Union Jack at anti-Prohibition demonstrations, it is ten to one that the reply might startle the questioner.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, August 12, 1939.

MR. JINNAH'S FALLACIES.

In the course of an address to the Ismail College Students Union last Sunday Mr. Jinnah declared that in his view there was no such thing as democracy in any part of the world today. We would go further: there has been never such a thing at any time past and there never will be in the future, in Lincoln's sense of "government of the people, by the people, for the people." Democracy is and will always be an ideal, an aspiration. Government of the people by the people, has no meaning. Government implies a dualism with the rulers and the ruled as two distinct categories. The monism of the rulers and ruled as identical, is a metaphysical concept and not a political one. Government by the people for the people, likewise confuses the subject and object. Government of the people for the people, on the other hand, is a real political concept and the only one. It is also the concept pervading the political philosophy of India. Lincoln's definition should be amended to run, Government of the people, by some of the people, for all the people. There should be government first: law and order should be maintained. This can only be done and has always been done by some people who have worked their way up to power by force of character or have got themselves elected to it by the arts of electioneering. In the first case, the government is known as an autocracy or oligarchy; in the second case it is called democracy. In both cases the rulers have to command a certain modicum of popular support. Only the methods by which it is secured and retained differ. We have a vivid illustration of the realities as distinguished from the illusions of democracy in the conflict now raging between the President and the Congress of the United States of America, both elected by universal suffrage. The same conflict exists in Great Britain today in a veiled form. The Cabinet for the time being has complete control of the machine just as much as an oligarchy which in fact it is, or an autocracy.

Mr. Jinnah repudiated the claim of the Indian National Congress to style itself a democracy. As a matter of fact, the Congress has, to all intents and purposes, given up doing so since it took office in the provinces. No secret is made of the fact that Ministers have mainly to carry out the wishes of Gandhiji and the Parliamentary Board. We have not yet found a suitable word to apply to the system which the Congress has evolved for its own constitution. Its main underlying principle seems to be that Power and Responsibility should not be vested in the same persons. This is worse than autocracy where the autocrat holds both Power and Responsibility in his own hands. Here, the Ministers get all the kicks: the High Command gets all the credit. What is true of the Congress organisation is also of the Muslim League—in fact more so. The Congress at least goes through the formality of electing a President every year: the Muslim League has Mr. Jinnah for its permanent and perpetual President. The Muslim League has no Parliamentary Board. But there is no Muslim League Government in any province for the simple reason that only a Muslim can belong to the Muslim League and no Government can last for a day even in the provinces where the Muslims form a majority in the Legislature, unless it has one or more non-muslim Ministers. Moreover there are only two provinces which have stable Muslim majorities. A Parliamentary Board of two would be like the poodle of which it will be difficult to see which was the head and which the tail.

In view of his general proposition that there is no democracy anywhere in the world, his opinion that democracy is not suited to India loses all its sting. But what does Mr. Jinnah mean by democracy? Evidently he means something, otherwise he would not deny its existence nor would he declare that it is unsuitable to India. Whatever he means, however, can not be democracy. He can not think of the people of India except as Hindus and Muslims—the others do not count in his calculations—which is fundamentally irreconcilable with the democratic idea. In a striking article in the July number of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Andre Siegfried writes of "The French Democratic Tradition." A hundred and fifty years have passed since the principles of the French Revolution were enunciated in the "Declaration of Rights of Man and the Citizen." The principles of the French Revolution inspired and influenced political movements in all countries thereafter. But in no country has the democratic ideal been accepted in the same sense as in France. English democracy is for Englishmen alone. "Can one be sure that there is democracy in England?" asks this French writer. In the United States there is a truer sense of equality between man and man but it is limited to white men. If Mr. Jinnah has a democracy, it is limited to Muslims. The universality of the true democratic tradition which disregards all distinctions of caste, colour, creed, does not belong to it. "Muslims and Hindus," he is reported to have said, "were poles apart in faith, education, culture and philosophy. They were two distinct races or nationalities." It is the simple historical fact that 90 per cent of Indian Muslims are racially identical with the rest of the population. Conversion from one faith to another does not effect a change in racial characteristics. On the contrary, race has powerfully influenced religion. Indian Islam has many characteristics not possessed and not recognised by Islam in Arabia, Afghanistan, Persia, Iraq or Egypt. Mere assertions will not alter historical and ethnological facts. Hindu and Muslim philosophy in its higher reaches tend towards the same monistic goal. Mr. Jinnah is a Sindhi and he ought to know this, as Sind is the classic land where Hindu and Muslim mysticism met and joined hands, and where the effect of this union is still not extinct. As regards the popular religion, there is much in common between the Hindu and Mahomedan. If there is one doctrine of Hinduism which is most repugnant to the stern monotheism of Islam, it is that of Avatar or Incarnation relating to the descent of Deity on Earth to help and comfort humanity in its darkest hour of distress. Yet this doctrine is fundamental to more than one important sect of Indian Muslims. We do not think that Mr. Jinnah knowingly misrepresents facts. But it is obvious that he is very ignorant of the actual conditions prevailing in the country. We are not concerned to answer his challenge to the Congress. We are concerned only to correct his flagrantly incorrect asseverations about the differences between Hindus and Muslims. No one who is unable to see that the differences between them are superficial, and have been and can be overcome by a judicious leadership, is entitled to speak as a national leader. Mr. Jinnah, we are sorry to say, is not making any contribution to the great task of promoting good relations between Indian communities.

Crown Police:—The neglect or refusal of some provincial Governments to discountenance the organization of subversive movements against Indian States in their areas, is to be followed by the establishment of what will be known as the Crown Police under the control and to be paid out of the budget of the Crown Representative to carry out his obligations to the Indian States. What the relations of this new Force will be with the Provincial Police, remains to be seen. The Government of India, the Madras Prime Minister announced in the Provincial Legislative Assembly, has refused to agree to his suggestion to abolish their special Information Department, representatives of which are posted in the Provinces. They work ordinarily in co-operation with the Provincial Police but are not under the control of the Provincial Government. In regard to the appointment of the Agent of the Government of India in Burma, the Government of India has not accepted the recommendation of the Madras Government. Any one of these incidents can be made a major issue between the Congress and the Government of India if the former were in a mind to do so. That this has not been done shows that the Congress has shed some of its early aggressiveness and that the Government of India has correspondingly regained its liberty of action in matters in dispute with Provincial governments.

TEACHERS AND POLITICS—I.

(By the Rt. Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri)

One of the corner-stones upon which the educational edifice has been constructed is the grant-in-aid system. This was first promulgated in 1854 in the famous Despatch of Sir Charles Wood, which has now come to be called the Magna Carta of Indian Education. It laid down for the first time the lines upon which grants were to be given to those that laboured in the field of education. Those principles have upon the whole justified themselves. It is not difficult to see upon what grounds this system has been so highly recommended and consistently practised. In the first place, it is a great financial saving to Government that instead of maintaining public institutions wholly from their own funds they should be able to attain their object by merely aiding private effort in the field. In the second place, it is the only means in this poor country of obtaining a wide spread of education of all kinds. In the third place, it ensures a certain variety of educational work and prevents the whole of our education being cast in one iron mould, the Government mould. which is not always the best. Then you also have the possibility, wherever managers should like it, of introducing a system of religious education to the pupils. Government has to be strictly neutral in this respect, and in all schools under public management education is purely secular. Aided education, however, need not be under that disability. The last consideration that I will mention in favour of the grant-in-aid system is that it affords the people a certain amount of training in practical citizenship. They learn to combine their resources, and this is the foundation of common citizenship.

These principles were not always loyally or uniformly worked out by the Governments in India. In 1881 an educational commission was appointed mainly for the purpose of determining how far the principles of this Despatch were kept in view by the various Governmental agencies in the country. Sir William Wilson Hunter was the Chairman of the Commission and his report is considered to be one of the most weighty documents in the history of our education. The first point that they took up was that the Governments in the country should consider it their primary business to aid and develop aided education as far as possible:

> The rules should therefore be such as to make it clear that to evoke, guide and strengthen private effort is the object to which the main attention of the Department should always be given.

Then they recommended that the managers of these aided institutions should be consulted periodically by the Government officials in all important matters, a counsel which it cannot be said they have always respected. As a means of carrying out this great object they suggested that the Department should hold conferences periodically, first of their own officers, and occasionally of their own officials and managers of aided schools together. Now by these various conferences it was hoped that there would be a complete understanding and constant co-operation between Government on the one hand and the managers of aided education on the other. This happy consummation, however, was not always attained. The two parties pulled different ways. The Government, bureaucratically-minded as it was in those early days, refused to admit managers to the footing of complete co-operation and confidence which the framers of the Despatch of 1854 and the Hunter Commission envisaged. Conflicts constantly arose and Government dropped the habit of calling these conferences.

On the 31st of October 1899, the educational world was started by the publication in the Gazette of a considerable body of modifications of all kinds made both in the educational rules and the grant-in-aid code. The managers had been kept in complete ignorance and they were taken unawares. Now amongst the changes proposed there was one which took away from teachers the opportunity that they had theretofore enjoyed of taking part in political movements in the country. Not only were teachers forbidden, but the managers of aided schools also came under the ban.

At once there was an agitation of unprecedented magnitude. In this agitation which was spread throughout the Presidency and in which all people took part, members of the general public as well as the teachers and the managers who had been disabled, the Madras Teachers' Guild took the lead. The Guild was then fresh and was afforded a big opportunity of proving its youthful vigour. When we applied to be received in deputation the application was readily granted. Sir Arthur Havelock was the Governor, and we were an influential deputation. I was the youngest member of it and I happen to be the sole survivor. The principal member of the deputation was Dr. Miller; our spokesman was Rev. Kellett and we also had amongst us Rev. Pittendrigh, Rev. Macphail, Rev. Cooling, Mr. Lakshminarasu Naidu, Mr. K. B. Ramanathan and myself. We were received courteously and listened to patiently.

Now the result was that Government shook in their position and instructed the Director of Public Instruction at once to hold a conference. Accordingly an influential conference was held and the whole body of these changes came in for thorough review.

I must now quote the offending rules:

Managers should sign a declaration that neither they nor their teachers would take part either directly or indirectly in political movements or agitation, and that they would not attend political meetings without the previous consent of the Director-

No member of the staff or establishment of an institution under public management shall be permitted to take part either directly or indirectly in political movements or agitation or to attend a political meeting where the fact of his presence would be likely to be misconstrued or to impair his usefulness as a public servant.

The second clause is meant to apply to Government teachers and to teachers in Municipal and Board Schools.

As a result of the discussions at the Conference the rules were greatly modified. The fangs were drawn from them as it were, and, as they were subsequently re-published, they appeared comparatively innocuous. They held the ground for a great many years. There were slight changes now and then, and in their last form I find they were divided into rules for Colleges and rules for Schools. They were highly elaborated. The substance, however, is to be found in these two rules:

No Manager or member of the staff or establishment shall be permitted to take part in political agitation directed against the authority of Government, or inculcate opinions tending to excite feeling of political disloyalty or disaffection; and the pupils should not be permitted to attend political meetings or engage in any form of political agitation.

In the event of such misconduct being practised in and encouraged or permitted by the masters or managing authorities, the Director may, after due warning, withdraw recognition from the offending school or withdraw the grant-in-aid or withhold the privilege of competing for Government scholarships or of receiving Government scholars.

When the Congress Government came into power they apparently judged these rules too drastic, and in May 1938—i. e. little over a year ago—the Congress Government published a set of rules to supersede these. To the credit of the Congress Government these new rules greatly simplified matters. They also struck off the fetters in respect of political activity from managers and teachers and enlarged the status of students. Students were, under the old regulations, forbidden altogether to participate in any kind of political activity. We must be grateful to the Congress Government for the improvement, and I shall be the first to give them a sufficient meed of praise.

The first rule is: "No School or College should be barred against any one convicted of any offence whatsoever." That is to enable young students who, being misled by people who ought to know better, get into scrapes and may be convicted of sedition or other offence. Obviously it is not desirable that such young people should be prevented from reforming their lives. It was to help them that this rule was framed.

The second rule is: "Students of Schools and Colleges should abstain from active participation in party or communal politics." Apparently Congress considered it desirable that, when politics were of an anti-imperial kind, students should have liberty to participate. There is no rule about Managers and none whatever about teachers taking part in politics so that, according to these rules, the restrictions upon the liberties of Managers and teachers are removed.

Unfortunately in June, 1939, certain rules were introduced into the grant-in-aid code to which I am unable to give the same praise as to the rules of 1938. I almost think that the Congress Government repented of their original generosity to the teaching profession. Anyhow they now reintroduce into the educational law of the country a certain disability from the point of view of the future welfare and dignity of the profession.

A member of the teaching staff or other establishment employed as a whole-time or part-time servant, whether salaried or not, in a school or college which receives aid from Government, shall not stand as a candidate or interfere, or use his influencce in any way, or do anything in aid or in obstruction of any candidate, in an election to a legislative body constituted under the Government of India Act or under the Government of India Act 1935, or the local authority; nor shall he take part in, or subscribe in aid of, any electioneering party organisation.

Provided that, if he is qualified to vote at such an election he may exercise his right to vote, but shall as far as possible avoid giving any indication of the manner in which he proposes to exercise, or has exercised, that right.

The Manager of a school may be required by the Director of Public Instruction to dispense with the services of any member of the teaching staff or other establishment employed in the school who contravenes with the provisions of this rule; failure of the Manager to comply with such requisition shall render the school liable to forfeiture of Government grant.

If unlike the bureaucratic Government the Congress had established the practice of consulting the teachers or the managers before they were dealt with, they would then have discovered that the teachers were a non-offending class as a whole. I wonder whether you have seen any people of this class standing as candidates at big elections. They are generally speaking, without the necessary courage, the necessary self-confidence and the necessary money. This is a privilege which we have appreciated and enjoyed but have not used.

EASTERN INDUSTRIALISATION.

(By V. G. Ramakrishnan, Annamalai University).

By Eastern industrialisation is meant the industrial changes that are now taking place in the Eastern countries like Japan, India, China, etc This process of industrialisation is already beginning to tell upon the economy of the countries of the West. There are some aspects of Eastern industrialisation—the geographical position of the countries concerned, effects of climate and topography, transportation facilities, power resources, available stock of raw materials, etc. But much more fundamental to the countries of the West is the social setting in which the industrialisation of the Eastern countries is taking place, viz., the crowding upon the land of a dense and increasing agricultural population with small holdings so that the mass of the people live very close to the margin of subsistence. This factor of population to area is the basic economic fact of the East and a fundamental contrast between East and West. It explains the low standard of living, the low level of wages. The dense population predominantly engaged in agriculture, provides a background for industrialisation very different from the West. In the major European countries there has been less crowding on the land and more economic opportunity in the form of expanding foreign commerce. For example, in the U. S. A. industrialisation has occurred in the midst of material plenty and comparative labour scarcity.

In the Oriental countries, industrialisation is taking place in the presence of a great expanding reservoir of potential labour. Agricultural land is is overcrowded and the gradient of the population is away from and not towards the farm. The possibilities of emigration are limited. Being kept on the land for lack of economic opportunity, the increasing numbers have pushed the standard of living lower and lower. The outlet now provided by industrialisation draws a stream of workers from the countryside by a wage which in itself is extremely low but higher than the money income expected from agriculture. The level of wages in the Eastern countries is so remote from the Western standard. But such a low level of wages does not mean necessarily sweated labour. In general, it gives a somewhat higher standard of living than the worker from the rural areas has been accustomed to.

The low standard of living is because of the low cost of living and the requirements are a minimum and the demands of the people are limited to a nourishing and economical diet, simple housing, inexpensive cotton clothing and very few non-essentials; and the eastern standard of living yields relatively a high return in human comfort and in the satisfaction of primary human needs.

If Oriental wages are expressed in terms of purchasing power, they become much more nearly comparable with Western wages. For instance, an American cotton spinner receives a money-wage about 15 times the money-wage of a Chinese spinner, and 12 times that of a Japanese spinner or 10 times that of an Indian spinner. Expressed in terms of food units the cost of worker per day is that an American spinner receives only about 4 times the amount received by the Chinese and 3 times the Japanese.

It is said that the Oriental wage level is low but Oriental labour constitutes no threat because of its many deficiencies — its agricultural background for many centuries, the attachment of the Oriental population to the land, and the village. It turns to the city and to industry reluctantly. Recruiting has been necessary to provide the labour for factories. The labour turnover is high and continued replacement of the workers is necessary, since they are likely after a year or two in the factory to return to their villages. Such labour is unskilled in the use of machinery and with the constant shifting, adequate training becomes a difficult problem. The agricultural background has also given labour a peasant outlook — not exactly a lack of ambition, but a slow deliberate movement in keeping with the labour demands on a holding of land too small to keep a farmer fully occupied. Labour accepts long hours but it does not take to the tempo, the close application of continuous attention demanded in a machinery economy, and is, therefore, not efficient in the same sense as European factory labour. Many more workers are required for a given operation--e.g. in the Indian Jute and Cotton Mills, it is impossible to keep the workers in close attendance at their machines. They wander about and a group is always to be found in a courtyard smoking and talking and, unless the management has made provision for such conditions by adding workers beyond the actual minimum required, the machines are idle and they are rattling on unattended. But in Japan with increasing industrial maturity, Japanese standards approach the standards of the West. Because of inefficiency and the lack of training, comparative labour costs, i. e., the amount of labour required to produce a unit of goods, are higher in the Orient than in the Western industrial countries. For example, an Indian spinner will tend only 100 to 200 spindles; a Chinese 200 to 400 spindles, a Japanese from 400 to 800 spindles; and an American 1,000 to 2,700 spindles. In the weaving sheds in India, the usual practice is one man to one loom; a Chinese weaver will operate 2 to 4 looms; a Japanese about 6 looms; and an American 4 to 12 non-automatic looms. Similar differences exist in other factory industries, and in mining. As long as Oriental labour is untrained, inefficient and poorly disciplined, it is not cheap labour despite the low wages. So much more labour is required per unit of product that labour costs one relatively high.

But it is a mistake to assume that the deficiencies of Oriental labour are permanent. They are the marks of the agricultural roots of the workers and they can all be changed and they are being changed. The labour can be trained; its efficiency can be increased; the industrial population is becoming more stable; management is becoming more effective. In the Eastern countries there are many factors much more efficient, particularly in Japan. Japanese efficiency was sometime ago on a par with that of China but now in a comparatively brief period of industrialisation amazing improvements in manufacturing effectiveness have been accomplished through more familiarity with machine industry, adequate training discipline of labour and better organisation within the plants. The striking improvements in the efficiency of Japanese labour have been accomplished with no advance in the wage level. In fact owing to the stream of labour into Japanese industry, the trend of wages has been downward. But the downward trend may not last long. The standard of living in the East may be efficient but it is not very elastic. Organisation of labour may bring this about. There is much more discontent among the rural classes in the Eastern countries than among the industrial population though it is not very articulate. The margin of subsistence is pushed so closely that by-occupations are essential. There is spare time. This surplus time could be turned to good account

It is this surplus and idle labour of the farm that is the basis of Gandhi's movement for hand spinning in India. Before the entrance of Western goods, each Oriental country tended to be self-sufficient for the staple goods consumed by the farmers and the villagers. With the spread of cheap machine-made goods the competition for village industries has become severe. As each by-occupation or handicraft industry declines, the poverty of the rural area is intensified.

If Eastern industrialisation proceeds apace, as it is doing now, in the first stage, these countries have to displace their chief direct labour with indirect labour in the form of equipment that, in the beginning at least, must be brought from the West. In such circumstances the Orient is making use of the indirect costs of countries with higher wage levels and must add also the cost of transporting the equipment from Europe or America and the expense of repairs. In the second stage of industrialisation, however,—the manufacture of machinery in the Oriental countries—the gain to the Oriental becomes apparent. The industries then have both cheap indirect and cheap direct labour. Japan has reached that stage to a considerable degree. A few years ago, Japanese industries were mainly producers of consumers' goods and the equipment for Japanese factories was imported from the U. S. A., Germany, Great Britain or Sweden. Today it is made in Japan. And this fact is one main reason why Japan is now able to flood the world markets with low priced cotton textiles. Not only do the Japanese textile mills enjoy low wages but their capital charges in plant and equipment are low. There remains one major aspect of Eastern industrialisation. Will not the further introduction of machinery into a crowded population organised on a handicraft economy create a problem of labour displacement far more serious than any technological unemployment experienced by the West? Evidence points to the continued increase of the population in India, China and Japan. It is not likely that any substantial part of the increase can be absorbed in agriculture, since holdings are already too small. And there is comparatively little unused land to be reclaimed. Moreover there are indications that the food supply of the Orient will be produced by fewer workers than at present. Crop yields are being improved by seed selection and by better methods of cultivation. Emigration provides no relief. Manufacturing industry remains the one promising outlet for the population. It may be taken for granted that once begun, industrialisation will continue and the rate of development will accelerate.

To reconcile an increasing labour supply and a progressive reduction of relative labour through the use of machinery, three possibilities present themselves:

(1) There will be a growth of the consumers' goods industries in response to an increasing demand in the domestic market arising partly from the replacement of the goods formerly supplied by handicraft industries or imported abroad, and partly perhaps from increased individual purchasing power. The handicarft industries have declined and imported goods are being displaced by goods of Oriental manufacture, but any appreciable increase in purchasing power is problematical in view of the depressing effect of the population pressure upon incomes.

(2) A part of the labour will be absorbed in the development of capital goods industries to supply the machines demanded by the manufacturers of consumers' goods and now imported from the West.

(3) The labour and the machines will be used to produce goods for export as they are now being used in Japan. It is in this pressure of export [illegible] Oriental industrialisation becomes particular significant to the West.

As long as India, China and Japan were isolated or provided only raw materials or exotic products in exchange for the manufactures of the West, Western economists could argue that the low money wages and low real incomes in the Orient were not factors in international trade. When the East and the West begin to pour competitive goods into the same world markets, a direct interaction of the two distinct and widely separated standards of living and a major alteration in the course of world trade would seem inevitable.

SOCIAL DISORGANISATION IN INDIA—II.

(BY KEWAL MOTWANI, ADYAR.)

Amidst our wide-spread social disorganisation there is very little intelligently organised social welfare work. We have yet to learn how to organise our charities so as to make every rupee go the longest way. Social welfare work is a science, not a mere soft sentimentality.

Our education cannot help representing the success of the philosophy of science and machine. In the first place, most of our institutions of higher learning are located in cities, creations of science. The success of physical sciences that have come from the west has led to our indiscriminate homage to the philosophy that they represent. Consequently, the ideologies of struggle for existence and survival of the fittest have fought their way into our educational theory. There is no adjustment between education and life around us. While unemployment increases, while the village is in the process of disintegration and men herd together in cities in search of work, the universities continue to receive and send out graduates by the thousand. Meanwhile, the proportion of possible employments to the number of claimants grows narrower, and there is widespread dissatisfaction.

The number of subjects taught in our universities has certainly increased; sometimes, one feels that the syllabuses are unnecessarily overburdened. A want of idealism still clings to our educational system. Our students are compelled to develop a mania for passing examinations. They want the largest number of marks with the strictest economy of knowledge and labour. Annotations abound. There is a great emphasis on natural sciences, the social sciences are offered in a very truncated manner. There is no binding link between them, they function in isolation and without any reference to the larger realities of life. The younger generation does not leave our halls of learning sufficiently strengthened to adjust itself to the new environments created by machine and science and discharge the duties on its return to the life of the world. When every boy and girl from the village comes running and seeks admission to the college and the university, the professors must be overworked. The emphasis is on quantity, all along the line. There can be neither creative study on the part of the students, nor efficient teaching on the part of the professors, since both must work under pressure and for a set purpose, which is to eke out a living.

The philosophy of science and machine is conflict, and the relationship between the teacher and the student is based on conflict. The teacher can no longer be considered as one who imparts knowledge and should, therefore, be reverenced; and the student is no more a candidate for wisdom. Both become cogs in the machine, the former to earn a living, the latter to pass examinations and get out. The students have learnt to go on strike in exactly the same manner as do the industrial workers in the factories and the mills. There is a continuous friction between the teacher and the taught. The students demand dismissal of teachers and officials whose lives have been dedicated to India's service for decades. There is not a day that we do not come across a report of some school or college strike or leakage of examination papers, which is only another form of sabotage. This is a sad commentary indeed on a country whose educational ideals and institutions have been models for imitation by other civilisations of early times.

The commercialised entertainment, the movie, the radio and the race course surround our young men and women in our cities; it is only natural that there should be a craving for sensation. False ideals of "getting rich quick" dominate the minds of the students; wealth has become the criterion of appraising the greatness of individuals. The seeds for scramble for worldly goods are sown in the early school and college days of our students. Our younger generation is no longer prepared to accept the social and religious controls which the older has known, the link between the past and the present is being quickly broken. Sex is already rearing its threatening head and becoming a major problem in our educational institutions. In a situation such as this, it is only natural that our higher educational system should come in for a good deal of criticism and the demand for its over-hauling become insistent.

When we come to the political scene, the effects of conflict with the western-culture assume alarming proportions. Democracy, a child of science and machine, is being transplanted in India, with all its futilities. We, like the west, are beginning to believe in the hallucination of numbers. We must have large electorates, legislatures with large numbers of representatives. Whether these representatives attend the sessions regularly or not, look upon their tasks as grave responsibilities, and whether they have the brains to understand fully and appreciate the significance of the complex problems of a changing social order is another matter. We judge the strength of our political organisations by their size. Quantity reigns supreme; quality is at a discount. It is the mob psychology that prevails. Those who wear a particular kind of head-gear or have been to jail for a few months, have earned the right to sit in the deliberative assemblies of a nation that prides itself on placing brahman, man of the wisdom, above the heads of the "madding crowd." Our National Congress has a tremendous task before it if it only realised its significance.

The modern technique of propaganda is throwing out into the limelight a new type of leader who is very much like the political boss of the west. With the printing press and the platform at his disposal, he exploits the enthusiasm of the masses under the mark of patriotism. Self-interest, not service of the people, is what counts. We have developed a plethora of parties, and our politicians are picking up the art of lobbying and jobbery. In one province alone, there are no less than nine political parties. These are the offspring of industrialism, of machine and science.

We have a hoard of contending political ideologies, fighting for mastery; socialism, syndicalism, bolshevism, fascism and the rest. The meredian of international politics may shift from Madrid to Moscow, from Munich to Tokyo, but we follow it with close attention. We have become internationally minded, and yet we are pathetically provincial.

One of the most interesting fields for study of the effects of the new culture of machine and science is that of inter-provincial relationships. Fate called India to a synthesis of peoples, races, religions and philosophies. People moved freely from province to province; they went on pilgrimages, made their residences far away from their homes. This free mingling was further augmented by railways and other mechanical devices of western culture. But by a curious twist in our psychology, we have become victims of petty provincialism, division, isolation. Our provincialism is very much analogous to the aggressive nationalism of the western nations, some of which are smaller than our districts. If the Congress High Command has been compelled to accept this balkanisation of India, it is because the philosophy of conflict and self-interest has come to stay with us. We are subverting the processes of history, and, with our limited vision, are segregating people into their respective regions. The provincial Public Service Commissions advertise widely for applications for various government posts, but they do not fail to make it clear that only residents of the province need apply. We are thus sacrificing talent for the sake of provincial preferences and nepotism. Each linguistic area of India now demands autonomy and wants to be separated from other parts. The efforts of the Government of Madras to introduce Hindi into the Province has met with considerable opposition.

When viewed as a social process, this is exactly the same thing as the western arrogant nationalism and hatred that have made Europe a shambles. Only we have no weapons to carry on the warfare, but the conflict-patterns, both in India and Europe have a family-likeness. To look upon India as a part of the world, to envisage her problems from national and international points of view is something very much different from thinking of her in terms of a community, party or province. That way lies death. The nemesis that has over-taken the mechanised west will be our fate. Mobility, spatial and social, that is migration of people from one province to the other and along the sliding scale of social status, is one of the most vital elements of social progress.

The philosophy of rights, aggressive and assertive, is a creation of mechanical civilisation. The possessed and the dispossessed are always engaged in a mutual war. We, in India, are immortalising these legal fictions in our Constitution. Duty, dharma, an intelligent adaptation to environment, with one's feet firmly fixed in the eternal verities, finds no place in our life. Our future generations, drilled in these dogmas of rights and privileges, of success at the cost of the other fellow, will rush at each other's throats as will these provinces fight with each other. The repetition of Europe's history, in a slightly different form, is not a remote possibility in India. No matter how stable our organisation or the party programme may be, the process of national disintegration can slip through and clutch at our very souls.

How can any higher feelings or spiritual values supervene when the educational institutions give no attention to the problem, when the social, economic and political institutions are based on conflict? Religion which smoothens social life, helps the individual to find his niche in the social cosmos and fulfil his dharma, which imparts enthusiasm to his efforts for human welfare, which softens the blows of fate, which enriches and expands his inner being and sustainshim in his sorrow, that religion has no place in a mechanised milieu. Money-making becomes the summum bonum of life, people are all the time goaded on to success. The sources of friction, however trivial, between the two major communities of India begin to multiply and there is a constant fear of general disruption. Separation, Pakistan, Jihad, are all phases of a machine-mind. We are in danger of accepting the materialistic philosophy of life and rationalistic religion of the same type and on the same scale as in the west, unless we take special care to guard ourselves from contamination. Evidences of a new materialism in India are not wanting. The modern barbarian has his habitat here as in any other part of the world.

The present social disorganisation that we witness in India is born of conflict between two cultures and has to be intelligently understood and consciously controlled. But how are we to do it?

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND SOCIAL STANDARDS.

The League of Nations has set a standard for social treatment which no authority in the world can ignore. It was with this comment that one of the experts called to assist the Advisory Committee on Social Questions summarised the work of its recent session in Geneva. With regard to some particularly difficult social problems, such as the prevention of prostitution and the position of illegitimate children, the League has done pioneer work. With regard to the general question of organisation and administration of welfare work, social assistance, vocational guidance and training for young people, the League has been able to render immense service to public authorities by collecting information and experience from different countries and providing a meeting-ground where both Government representatives and experts working in these fields may discuss their common problems.

It is a commonplace that the effects of the crisis and widespread unemployment have brought problems of social organisation to the forefront in every country. It is now no longer possible for any Government to distinguish between problems of a political order on the one hand, and those of a social nature on the other. Indeed, the main preoccupation of every Government today is to maintain a social economy and a standard of living in which every economic rank may make its best contribution to the public weal. It follows that increased attention is being given to the welfare of children, the training of young people and the provision of wholesome surroundings, both physical and social for all. The work which different League bodies are doing with regard to nutrition, housing, vocational guidance and apprenticeship is proving of immense help to Governments in their task of meeting the Governments' social challenge of the economic crisis.

The recent meeting of the Advisory Committee on Social Questions made a further contribution to social welfare when it discussed the training to be given to persons engaged in any sort of social work, and the organisation and administration of welfare work among young people. Their discussion on the first problem showed their concern that people engaged in any activity for promoting the social welfare of other members of the community should bring to their task that attitude of mind and training which will enable them to deal with the maze of questions bound up in the modern social order; questions of health and protection against disease as well as problems of conduct and personal relations within the family and the community.

The discussion brought out the observation that in general, there seems to exist a gap between social workers (those concerned primarily with problems of human relations in society), on the one hand, and, on the other, public health workers, district nurses and physicians, whose primary concern is for health and prevention of disease. Now that the care given in schools is being supplemented by the employment of school nurses and the work of social workers is being assisted by public health visitors, there is urgent need for co-ordinating these physical and social services, which together seek to minister to the needs of modern society. Social workers should have some understanding of the nature and importance of the problem with which the district nurse deals and the latter, on her part, should be given some training to help her appreciate the specially "social" approach of the trained social worker. Above all, it was emphasised that social work will not be given proper scope unless those people engaged in public administration, municipal or national, acquire during their period of training some understanding of the importance of problems of public health and social work in modern life.

The comparative study which the Advisory Committee is preparing on provisions adopted for the organisation and administration of welfare work among the young, including social assistance, is designed to assist Governments in achieving the system of welfare work and social service most apt to meet their particular needs. The study presents conclusions derived from a survey of the welfare organisations of thirteen countries. The Rapporteur, Mme Brault, a French expert on this question, drew attention to the organisation of public welfare work in Poland which illustrated, in her view, an efficient way of dealing with the many problems facing public authorities. The Polish administration was based upon the idea that the authorities are bound to go to the aid of any needy person, of whatever rank or class, as the State: their first duty was to minister to the needs of youth and childhood. The competence and work of the different ministries and public bodies responsible for public welfare was co-ordinated in such a way as to leave no gaps where need might be felt, while avoiding duplication of effort and expense. Penal administration, the rights of minors under the law, regulation of apprenticeship and entry into work, technical and professional training for young people, special teaching for young people whose lives are to be passed in agricultural districts, health, nutrition, social assistance, medical assistance, assistance for needy young people living abroad; these are some of the many problems which must be provided for in an adequate administration of public welfare.

"Iron Lungs" For Bombay:—Thirteen "Iron Lungs" have been requisitioned by the Government of Bombay for the different hospitals in the presidency from the Nuffield Institute for Medical Research in England. Five "lungs" will be utilised for the Government hospitals, and others will be distributed among the private hospitals controlling 100 beds and over. The J. J. Group of Hospitals and G. T. Hospital will have a "lung" each. The Sassoon Hospital, Poona and Civil Hospital, Ahmedabad too will have a "lung" each. Among the private hospitals, it is understood that the Parsi General Hospital, K. E. M. Hospital, Bai Jerbai Wadia Hospital, Harkisondas Hospital and Singhanee Hospital also will have a "lung." Members of the staff of the Hospital where the lung is to be installed will be trained in the use of tha "lung."

THE ARYAS IN HYDERABAD.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. P. V. Ratnam has replied to my letter which appeared in your issue of the 15th July 1939. I am writing this to enlighten Mr. Ratnam on some points.

I wonder if Mr. Ratnam has aquainted himself with all that has transpired during the six years preceding the launching of the satyagrah movement. No representations, as their careful perusal will show, were made "in a dictatorial and threatening spirit."

As regards the forcible removal of our flag he has conceded it at least in one case, but this does not show that other cases of the kind did not exist. I however, quote below a Government prohibiting the carrying of Om Flags.

It is an order of the Muntzim Kotwali station House Rosa, Taluqua Latur District Usmanabad, dated 21st Asfander 1347 F (23rd January 1938) No. 243 to Madho Brother, Qasba Kalare:

You have taken out a flag with boys from your house without permission of the Department concerned which is not only against law but in defiance of orders for which a separate explanation has been called for. In future no flag is to be taken out without permission and if the order is not obeyed you shall be challaned.

Thus despite the justice which Mr. Ratnam thinks had been done in the case of Kalyani, the restriction on the flag, as ordained by law, continues.

It will be readily conceded by Mr. Ratnam and by you too, dear Sir, that laws are not always framed for immediate use but for a possible distant emergency and then much depends upon the spirit in which these laws are executed. Mr. Ratnam says, "The insinuation that the Arya Samajists are groaning under oppression of a prejudiced Ecclesiastical Department is false. Such regulations as are existing in Hyderabad are common to all religions and are framed on the principle of safeguarding public tranquility, without discrimination." It will be, however, a revelation to your readers and Mr. Ratnam as well that there are separate rules in Hyderabad for the construction, alteration and supervision of religious houses for the Muslims. The buildings to which these rules are applicable are the following :—Mosque, Idgah, Makan Asar Sharif and Tabarrukat, (Relics of religious buildings) Monasteries, the houses of preaching, Tombs, Ashurkhanas.

The list comprehends all possible places of worship or reverence from religious point of view. They are divided into three classes : (1) Government buildings, (2) Buildings under Waqf which are or shall be inhabited, (3) The buildings which are uninhabited.

The first class of buildings are Government buildings and must needs be maintained by Government and looked after Government offcials. They can be repaired, overhauled and extended without let or hindrance and any amount of money with the permission of the Government spent on them. The remaining two classes also receive Government grants after due reports. So the rules framed for erection, extension or repair of religious places are primarily meant for the religious places of Hindus. When applications concerning Hindu temples are to be heard by the Ecclesiastical Department, which has of late come into the limelight, one can easily understand what the fate of these applications must generally be.

I said in my last letter that the restrictions which are galling are recent innovations and have been the cause of so much irritation. Mr. Ratnam has very conveniently neglected this point and taken shelter behind the plea that these regulations were framed some 40 years ago and if "census statistics are correct three decades ago the Arya Samajists barely existed in Hyderabad and there was only one Arya Mandir." Even this shows that there were Arya Samajists even before this Mandir was built more than three decades ago. It is possible, that the building of this very Mandir may have put theidea of framing these rules into the heads of thosewho did it.

But our fight is not about the past. It is about the disabilities we are now labouring under.

After enumerating all rules and regulations issued by the Ecclesiastical Department imposing restructions on the construction of new and the repair of old temples, Nishan No. 376 dated 24th Asfendar 1347F (26th January 1938) of the Ecclesiastical Code, page 395, Latest Edition, says :—"Havan Kund comes under the definition of place of worship." This is a very cunning trick that has been played. The Havan Kund, as every one knows, is not in itself a place of worship, but only an appendage for doing worship or for the performance of any religious ceremony. The house or place where people congregate for some religious purpose is the place of worship and not the Havan Kund as such. But as Havan invariably forms a part of and a prelude to all our religious ceremonies, so in bringing the Havan Kund under the category of a place of worship and placing a ban on it, the Ecclesiastical Department has very adroitly stopped the holding of religious meetings, even within buildings, which are allowed by Section (i) of Annexure IX of the Government-Paper named "Arya Samaj in Hyderabad," for the very construction of a Havan Kund will give the place the sanctity of a temple and will then need the permission of the Government (Ecclesiastical Department) for using it as such. There is another order to the same effect but coming from a higher authority and at a much later date. The Kotwal of Hyderabad writes inter alia to the Secretary, Arya Samaj, Hyderabad on 21st April 1939 : "If you construct a pucca Havan Kund in your Samaj which makes it a permanent temple you should obtain permission for it as early as possible but if it is temporary then there is no objection." I may here add that a Samaj temple can also be without a pucca Havan Kund as they invariably are on hill stations.

I have said this much about the flag and the construction of temples. But there are other graver things. The reforms announce "that the existing rules in regard to public meetings (requiring previous permission for holding such meetings) may be repealed" but you will be surprised to know that though socialists, even communists, will be free to hold public meetings anywhere without permission, no religious meeting will be allowed to be held in the open. In British India restrictions, if any, are laid on meetings of a political character and not on religious meetings but in Hyderabad the case is quite different. Here religious meetings are more to be dreaded than political meetings of howscever subversive a character they might be. There is also, as the reforms claim, no freedom for the formation of religious associations particularly Arya Samajes.

Are not these facts enough to prove to even as ardent advocate of the Nizam's Government an Mr. Ratnam seems to be, that the Hindus in Hyderabad who number 88% and who fill the Government treasury are groaning under a step-motherly treatment which has now become unbearable even for their patient and resigning nature?

The resolutions passed by the Working Committee of the International Aryan League in connection with the discontinuance of the Hyderabad Satyagraha movement read:—

(1) In view of the communique issued today by the Government of H. E. H. the Nizam clarifying certain points by the Sarvadeshik Sabha and particularly in view of the spirit of conciliation behind this clarification and in deference to the opinions of highly placed friends and wellwishers who helped to bring about the above clarification and whose sympathy and support the Sabha greatly values, this Sabha fees itself justified to discontinue the satyagraha movement and does hereby declare its discontinuance. The Sabha also directs the satyagraha committee to disband the "jathas" stationed at different places. In the opinion of the Sahha the clarification referred to above represents an earnest attempt on the part of the Government of the Nizam to meet the demands for which the Satyagraha was launched. The Sabha has taken the responsibility for the discontinuance of the satyagraha fully trusting the good intentions of His Exalted Highness' Government and relying upon a liberal interpretation of those declarations The Arya Satyagraha was undertaken is no spirit of defiance of or hostility to the Nizam's Government and not in any way, directly or indirectly, to promote communal discord. The sole motive behind the movement has been vindication of religious and cultural freedom.

(2) In order that all this valuable sacrifice may yield the best possible result it is in the opinion of the Sabha all the more necessary now for Aryas and other Hindus, more specially those in the Dominions of H. E. H. the Nizam, to exercise self-restraint and conform more strictly to truth and non-violence in a true religious spirit.

(3) The Sabha acknowledges with thanks the willing co-operation which it received during the days of the satyagraha campaign generally from the Press in India. The Sabha expresses its sense of obligation to all those institutions and persons who rendered assistance, financial or otherwise, to the movement. The Sabha, on behalf of all Aryas in India and abroad, offers their respectful homage to the sacred memory of the martyrs who laid down their lives in the cause of Vedic Dharma.

JOURNALISTS ASSOCIATION OF INDIA.

The following is the draft resolution which was thrown out by a majority of the members of the Executive Committee:

Resolved,

That in the opinion of the Council of the Journalists' Association the order of the Chief Presidency Magistrate issued on the 1st August under Section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, directing five specified newspapers to abstain from publishing any news, articles or comments relating to the riot that took place that day or any other riot which might have occurred or may occur in the course of the next two months, and to any agitation or protests against the Urban Immovable Property Tax, is highly objectionable:

(1) on the ground of principle as an infringement of the legitimate right and duty of the Press to report and comment on current events and on questions of public interest and importance, the due exercise of which right and the due discharge of which duty is essential to the growth and maintenance of civil freedom and ordered government based on law and not on the individual sentiments of any person in authority;

(2) on the ground that it is directed against five newspapers in contravention of the Prime Minister's admission in his appeal issued on the 31st July, that "in the heat of controversy many harsh things have been said on both sides" and contrary to the Home Minister's statement on the same day that "the ban is not intended to prevent legitimate criticism of Government measure;"

(3) on the ground that the order covers not only the riot of Tuesday but any riot that may happen within the next two months, and that it prohibits criticism of the Urban Immovable Property Tax which are all matters for legitimate public criticism and comment.

The Council of the Journalists' Association of India therefore, is of opinion that the order should be immediately withdrawn and that steps should be taken to get the law amended so as to make similar orders impossible in the future.

SILENT FILMS FOR INDIA?

In a personal article in The Reformer of May 13, 1939 Mr. K. Natarajan remarked that the solution of many of India's language difficulties for exhibitors of films lay in a return to the silent pictures. The following extract from a letter to the Statesman from its film correspondent, shows that an attempt is being made to revert to the silent film:—

"A new type of silent film, designed to educate India's millions, has been proposed by Mr. A. J. Patel, a prominent Bombay film producer, now in Hollywood.

"He explained to a friend of mine that the films must be silent in order to overcome the handicap of India's diversity of languages and dialects. There would be no captions, because few of the prospective audiences could read them.

"English people don't realize what a blow it was to many races when talking pictures came in," he said, "To them, the silent picture was the great link with other peoples and the chief source of education and entertainment."

"The pictures, while telling stories, will be really constructive. Travelogues and technical films showing the industries of other lands are proposed, and, whenever possible, the pictures will be made in India.

"In this manner," Mr. Patel said, "I believe we can reach all of India's 400,000,000 inhabitants with messages against child marriage and uncleanliness, and for an improved economy."

"Mr. Patel also explained that in place of captions explanatory booklets would be provided in theatres in the vernacular of each district. They would be read by specially trained lecturers."

League of Nations Broadcasting Station:—The Swiss Government is negotiating for purchase of the League of Nations private Radio broadcasting station. Official circles have disclosed that negotiations have been in progress for the last two months and only the price remains to be settled. M. Avenol said that he had been prompted to authorise the sale by two chief considerations, firstly, expenditure on the station in recent years had greatly exceeded receipts and the League's declining membership necessitated sharp budgetary reduction. Secondly, as the station enjoys extra-territorial rights, the Government had been somewhat alarmed with regard to the use that might be made of it in war-time.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

NOTES.

Change of Method Recommended :—Mr. Rajagopalacharya's defence of his promulgation of a Governor's Ordinance to arrest pending litigation on the Madura Temple entry incident, is not materially different from that of Lord Willingdon in justification of his Ordinances to restrain Civil Disobedience. The fact is that the Madras Premier's hands were forced by the shock tactics of Mrs. Brijlal Nehru in Madura. At a meeting held in Madras subsequently, Mrs. Nehru revealed that before she went to Madura she had interviewed the Premier. He was very pessimistic, he did not think that the reform will come in his life-time. When, therefore, she demonstrated that it could and did come when barely a week of his life-time had passed since the interview, he was—well, we do not know what his feelings were. When the incident led to litigation which, under the law as it stood, must have gone against the entrants, the Prime Minister took the only step that was open to a Minister whose of freedom love was not equal to his zeal for Temple Entry. But he does not want to see a repetition of such incidents. Speaking at Madura this week he deprecated holding large meetings to bring pressure on other people or to try to influence them. They must adopt other methods. Their propaganda in future, said the Premier, should take another form. As Mr. Ramanathan had said, there were old people in their homes who did not agree with them. And they knew with what respect these elders should be dealt with. Similarly it was for them to speak to their neighbours, relatives and friends and explain the justice of this movement. They should tell them that this was a big temple built by their Rajas and the general public and that it was a big institution from which it was not right to exclude only two or three classes out of the hundreds of sub-castes of the Hindu community. Those others also wished to go to the temple with true Bhakti and not for mere fun or bravado. It did not matter if those who were fully fed did not go. But the poor were in sore need to go God was like the mighty ocean, which could not be dried up by any number of people worshipping him in the temple. That was the argument that they should adopt in persuading the people. They should tell them that no harm would come if they changed a particular custom for doing good to others. They should do this kind of propaganda with patience. It was not because people did not realise the justice of the cause that this reform had not so far been brought about. It was because they had not been able to muster sufficient courage. There were numerous sub-castes among them and each one of them was proud and jealous of his caste. But in the matter of going to a big temple all of them forgot their differences and went together. They should do the same in the case of Harijans also.

What Mr. Rajagopalacharya recommends here is a reversion to the methods of the older school of reformers, the Raja Ram Mohan-Ranade school. In another connection we point out today the danger of calling out the crowds into the streets to advance social reform. The Madras Premier's advice is very timely and we trust it will be widely followed.

Contretemps on Prohibition Day :—The celebrations inaugurating Prohibition on the 1st August were marred by the occurrence of a nasty conflict between the Police and a Muslim procession which was declared by its organisers to be a demonstration not against Prohibition but against the property tax levied by Government to make up the loss of revenue on account of Prohibition. The tax is part and parcel of the Government Prohibition scheme and if it goes, Prohibition must go. The mode chosen by Government of financing Prohibition is open to reasonable objections but a street procession is not the proper way of proving that a better method might have been adopted to make up for the loss from the Prohibition which the processionists as good Muslims were bound to support. They could at least have chosen another day for their demonstration. Their demonstration would have been less liable to misapprehension and gained immensely in effect if they had joined the pro-Prohibition demonstrations of Tuesday and staged the anti-tax demonstration on Wednesday. Unfortunately, despite the remonstrance of the Police Commissioner, the Muslim leaders insisted on having their show on the same day as the Government show. The crowd got out of hand, started throwing stones and bottles at the police and was fired upon. Some fifty persons were injured on both sides. Happily, there was no loss of life. The incident has provoked bitter feelings which are not appeased by the order of Government under a much abused law imposing a ban forbidding comment not only on the riot but also on the property-tax for two months on five newspapers. We have no hesitation in saying that the order is absolutely indefensible. It is a flagrant attack on the Press, for which the only parallel that we can recall is the pre-censorship imposed on the Bombay Chronicle by Lord Lloyd's Government when the Civil Disobedience movement made its debut in Indian politics. Besides, Government themselves cannot be absolved from responsibility for the situation as it developed on Tuesday. That Government were aware that feelings were running high in the city and breaches of the peace were likely, is evident from the order of the Commissioner issued a day or two previously banning the carrying of sticks and knives on Prohibition day. This knowledge, and the reasons we gave last week, should have convinced Government of the necessity and wisdom of making the pro-Prohibition demonstrations, as little obtrusive as possible. The best and surest way of maintaining the public peace at a time of public excitement, is to keep the people engaged in their homes and working places. To get the crowd out in the streets is to court outbreaks of disorder. It is high time that processional politics were abandoned. It is a way of appealing to the emotions of the people over their reason, and fit only for demagogues. It is altogether out of place as an instrument in the hands of a constitutional Government.

Prohibition Unemployed:—The Government of Bombay have declared their special interest in the plight of those persons in the employment of liquor dealers prior to July 31, and they have offered to help those who were given "written notice of discharge" on account of Prohibition. It is an invidious policy for any Government to offer relief to one section of the community. That the Bombay Government should do so to the "prohibition unemployed" gives one the impression that in spite of the speeches and processions they are ashamed of their restrictions on the sale of liquor. This sympathy has no doubt been evoked by the general agitation by liquor dealers and has no rational basis behind it. The persons who were given "written notice of discharge" are but a fraction of even the number affected by the Excise police of the Bombay Government. The property tax, for instance, has had its repercussions on the building trade and it has from all accounts affected the employment of many labourers, both skilled and unskilled. Apart from that, most people who have had to pay the property tax, have had to cut down expenses in other directions. Often the cutting down exceeds the strict demands of economy, and it is hardly likely that, even if the tax is withdrawn at the end of the financial year, the new economies will be given up. The suburban railways lost a good number of their first class passengers when they raised the fares some years ago and they never got them back even after the fares were reduced to the old level. The rather disingenuous argument that there has been no increase in taxation, which certain Government spokesmen have advanced, is obviously unfair to that section of the community which, whether it can bear it or not, has to bear the extra burden. And the revelations of concessions to non-conformists have removed from the thinking citizen any feeling which he might have had at the outset that he was sacrificing personally in a great national cause. The strictness shown in giving out addict licenses has been reassuring. But the dangers of a lapse into leniency are very real so long as the Government order stands in its present wording.

The Indo-Ceylonese Muddle:—Referring to the delegation of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru to negotiate with the Ceylonese leaders on the impending repatriation of Indian employees of that Government in receipt of daily wages, we pointed out the advisability of Pandit Nehru acting in consultation with the Government of India. Recent incidents have shown that co-operation between Government and the Congress is no longer contrary to Congress policy. We remarked that in the absence of an understanding with the Government, there was the danger of Government and Congress working at cross-purposes. We are sorry that this is what has happened. The Pandit in his negotiations with the Ceylon Ministers kept prominently in view the impotance of maintaining friendly relations between the two countries. He regarded the repatriation of a few hundred employees as a minor issue. That he was able to impress on the Ministers and the Ceylonese people that India cherished the most friendly feelings towards them, is shown by the warmth of the reception accorded to him by all classes and by the observations of Sir Baron Jayatilaka, which we reprint. The Government of India, however, have proceeded on a different line. In fairness to them, we should say that the line which they have adopted is the one pressed on them in the Legislative Assembly and in the Indian Press. The Pandit's attitude, which is also ours, was somewhat unexpected. Government not only broke off trade negotiations with Ceylon. They have placed a ban from 1st August on the recruitment of unskilled workers in India to work on Ceylon plantations. They seem to have argued that, if the Ceylon Government is pursuing a policy of excluding Indian workers when they are no longer needed, India is not obliged to supply Ceylon with labour where she needs it. The Ceylon Government, it was reported, is unperturbed by this decision. But this is not in accord with the alarm expressed by the Prime Minister when he first heard that the Government of India might take such drastic action. Since the announcement was made two days ago Ceylonese opinion has completely thrown off the friendly professions which followed on Pandit Nehru's visit. The comments of the Press and political leaders are tinged with not a little bitterness. The Pandit has scored a great personal success but the situation between the two countries was never worse.

Bengal Prisoners and Congress Ministries :— The question of the release of political prisoners in Bengal has once again come into the limelight. From a speech delivered by Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose in Calcutta last Saturday, it is clear that Calcutta Congressmen had expected to persuade the Congress to regard the release of Bengal political prisoners as a major issue, to be decided if necessary by a threat of ministerial resignation in the other provinces of India. It is equally certain from his remarks that other Congressmen had failed to accept this position. Speaking at a Bombay meeting in sympathy with the prisoners, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru rightly rejected the idea of appealing to the Governor-General to intervene over the heads of the popular ministry in Bengal. It is fortunate that so soon after the Madras Governor's Temple Entry Ordinance, Congressmen should realise the dangers of invoking the reserve powers of the Governors and the Governor-General when it suits Congress ministries or political leaders to do so. A section of Bengal Congressmen looks forward to involving the whole of India in mass Civil Disobedience just because they have themselves failed to win power in Bengal. Otherwise it is difficult to understand why Mr. Bose should regard Pandit Nehru's advice in favour of direct popular agitation against the Bengal Ministry rather than for political pressure on the Governor-General through the Congress Governments in other provinces, as a rebuff to Bengal leaders. The only seemingly sound argument advanced for Governmental pressure from the Congress provinces by Mr. Bose, is that they were prepared to do so in the case of Rajkot. Mr. Bose was President of the Congress at the time and he should know best how prepared the Congress ministries were to resign over the Rajkot incidents. But it was clear to everybody that public opinion was by no means prepared in any of the provinces to see a ministerial exodus over a mismanaged political manoeuvre in a small Indian State. Mr. Bose has declared his intention to start satyagraha in Bengal, if the Bengal Ministry do not release the political prisoners immediately. On the other hand if they did, or if they were prevented by the Governor or the Governor-General, the Congress in Bengal would form a political unity with the Haq Cabinet. Mr. Bose assured his hearers that 10,000 volunteers would join from outside Bengal in satyagraha in spite of the refusal of other ministries to resign; he asked them to collect Rs. 10,000 and he wanted finally a supply of 10,000 volunteers from Bengal to be enrolled. The reasons for the recurrence of the figure 10,000 in Mr. Bose's calculations are obscure. Satyagraha could only then be launched in Bengal. Mr. Bose, according to the latest report, was able in the light of this declaration to persuade the prisoners to cease from their hunger-strike. Press reports seem to hint at an understanding between Bengal Congressmen and the Government for a two months' suspension of the present agitation at the end of which the prisoners will all be set free. The Bengal Cabinet has scored a political victory in persuading Congressmen that their only point of difference lies in the release of prisoners.

"The European in New India" :— How the European, as the native of Great Britain likes to be known in this country, has come to regard himself as the primary factor in the life of India and the people of the land as of importance only as his instruments, is well, though unconsciously, brought out in a paper read by Mr. Oliver Stebbings of Calcutta and the discussion thereon at the East India Association, London, last April. "The value of British investments in India," he said, "has been computed at £ 1,000,000,000." Mr. Stebbings did not, of course, mention at what sum the drawings from India by Britain have been computed. According to one authority, 5 shillings in the pound of the income of every Briton was obtained from India. The British national income is now estimated to be £ 5,000,000,000 per annum. The total investment as estimated by Mr. Stebbings of British capital in this country, is thus recouped in a single year, and this has been going on for several years. In other words, British capital in India yield a return of one hundred percent! It is not unnatural, therefore, for the agents of British investors to apprehend that they may not be able to do business on the same terms under a nationalist Government. It is natural too that the English commercial man does not like the Indian in the same field.

Theft and the Police:— The complaints which the ordinary citizen has against the police force are so frequently ventilated that it is good once in a way to see the police retaliating. In the annual report for 1938 on the Police of the City of Bombay, Mr. W. R. G. Smith, the Commissioner of Police, has made full use of his opportunity to read the public a salutary lesson. "Thefts by servants and criminal breach of trust cases by employees in business concerns," he writes, "were as numerous as in previous years. The victims in the majority of such cases have only themselves to blame. A pittance of a wage is usually paid and no attempt is made to enquire into the antecedents of the persons employed before engaging them. It is only tempting Providence to expect honesty in such circumstances." The warning to employers of labour to exercise due caution both in engaging their men and in giving responsible jobs to them, is very timely. It is appropriate that it should come from the police whose chief duties arise out of the mistaken judgment or misplaced trust not of employers only.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, August 5, 1939.

AN INDIAN HEPTARCHY.

The Tribune of Lahore publishes the text of Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan's Note on the scheme which he offers as an alternative to the Federation of the Government of India Act of 1935. He points out not quite correctly that the Government scheme has met with opposition from all parties in British India and the States. The Liberals, while criticising several features of the scheme, have decided that it should be worked for all it is worth. Their influence in the country is not to be measured by the numbers who attend their Conferences. The Hindu Mahasabha has taken up a more definitely favourable attitude to the acceptance of Federation. Under the Presidentship of Mr. Savarkar the Mahasabha has grown rapidly in strength and influence. The position of the Congress majority today approximates to that of the Liberals. Non-co-operation has been ruled out and co-operation is, though not the formally, the virtually accepted policy of Congress towards the Paramount Power. It is not right to say that the Princes have rejected the Federal scheme. So far from doing that, the Bombay Ministers' Conference pleaded for more time for the Princes to make up their minds, which Lord Linlithgow has allowed. The larger States are already committed to the acceptance of Federation. Of the smaller States, the Deccan and the East Bengal States have dissociated themselves from the dilatory resolution of the Bombay Conference. In the Muslim League itself the beginning of a split has manifested itself on the question. Sir Sikandar's scheme is plainly intended for the sole purpose of preventing this from developing into a schism. We can see no other occasion or purpose for it.

"Any alternative scheme to be generally accepted," Sir Sikandar writes, "must, therefore, be so devised as to allay the reasonable doubts and apprehensions of the minorities and the Indian States, and at the same time meet the criticism levelled on the score of inadequate political power which it is proposed to transfer to the representatives of the people under the present scheme." Sir Sikandar practically declares that the goal of Independence by whomsoever proclaimed is mere cant; that everybody would be satisfied with Dominion Status provided it is immediately presented to India. He does not pause to define what he means by Dominion Status. Is it the Dominion Status of the Westminister Statute which, according to the latest and most authoritative interpretation, carries with it the right of neutrality in any war in which the British Government may be involved? Canada has demanded to drop the designation of Dominion and to be called a Kingdom to mark the changed status which she now enjoys. The "Dominion" is, indeed, fast becoming obso... the coast-line is a problem not only for the defenders but also and more so for the invader. Not the length of the coast-line but the ratio which it bears to the area and population of the hinterland, is the decisive factor in a country's defence. The disaster which overtook Napoleon on his march on Moscow, is a lesson which has not lost its force in our day. In fact, paradoxical as it is, the conditions of modern warfare have placed a comparatively undeveloped agricultural country at an advantage as compared with highly industrialised nations. That is why Poland is able to challenge Nazi Germany, and why Czechoslovakia with her greater resources, a well-equipped and trained army, could not. Anyhow the length of the coast-line has nothing to do with the constitution of a Federation except that it favours a strong unitary central Government as against an impotent figurehead to which it is reduced in Sir Sikandar's scheme.

Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan is visibly beyond his depth when he criticises Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose for his policy of utilising the difficulties of the British Government to advance the cause of Indian self-government. From the strictly ethical point of view this is not a policy which can commend itself to men of high principles. But it was the policy of Count Cavour and later that of Mr. Thomas Masaryk in working for the independence of their respective countries to utilise the difficulties of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and both of them have been acclaimed as men of great foresight and patriotism. From the purely moral standpoint there is little to choose between those who would utilise their neighbours' difficulties to aggrandize themselves and those who would keep on good terms with a powerful neighbour because it saves them the effort of fending for themselves. Whether India should remain a part of the British Commonwealth and whether the British Commonwealth should retain India as a part of it, must depend ultimately on the consideration whether this would conduce to the greater good of humanity. Sir Sikandar thinks that India can help forward the cause of human brotherhood by remaining within the Commonwealth. Merely remaining within the Commonwealth, however, will not serve this purpose. India must be free to work for the good of humanity and in order to do so she must be in a position to influence British policy in the same direction. Otherwise India will be doing more harm than good to world peace by being a passive instrumentalism of what is often called British Imperialism. Her position at present is that of a passive and helpless retainer of Great Britain blindly following whatever world policy may commend itself to the Government in power in Great Britain.

BRITAIN'S COLONIAL POLICY.

Herr Hitler demands the return of the parts of Africa which before the last war, were under the political and economic domination of Germany, on the ground that they were wrongfully wrested by force from her. The argument with which several British and American writers of distinction incline to concur, is that the whole scheme of the Treaty of Versailles hinged upon the hypothesis that Germany was solely responsible for the last war. The German delegates signed the treaty under the threat of invasion of their country. It is now generally agreed that the war guilt must be shared by all the belligerents. The key-stone of the arch of the treaty thus falls to the ground. Other main clauses of the treaty have been allowed to lapse without effective protest and even with the consent of the Allies in the last War. This restitution of the colonies is the only outstanding issue which prevents a complete understanding between Germany and the Allies. Danzig is a minor matter. If the colonies are returned, the appeasement will be complete. These colonies are vitally necessary to Germany for raw materials of her industry. The opponents of the German demand in Great Britain, virtually accept the position that the Treaty of Versailles was no longer a valid argument against the restitution of the African colonies. The main consideration is the interests of the natives. From the way the Nazis treated the Jews, they can not be trusted to deal justly and humanely with the African natives. Pushed to find more substantial grounds they had to differentiate between the aims of the Germans and their own in Africa. The Germans wanted raw materials. The Africans can look forward to no higher prospect under them than to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Germans. This was not Britain's object. Britain was there for the good of the natives. As a climax came the announcement of the Secretary of State for the Colonies that the object of Britain was to train the natives to self-government. As an earnest of this, the British Government is establishing at once the Makerere College in Uganda which will be later developed into a university for Africans. It is intended to produce national leaders who will in the fulness of time take over the Government of their country in their own hands. To us in India all this has a familiar ring. For the last century and a half India is being trained to self-government. She is still being trained. The period of tutelage is not yet past. That is because English education has not produced men of the requisite calibre. That system is a failure. We have no doubt that a hundred and fifty years hence the graduates of the African University will be found to be as total misfits as the educated Indian today.

The British settlers in East Africa, however, have taken alarm at this declaration of His Majesty's Government and the establishment of the Makerere College. They have ambitions of an East African Union like the South African Union and in harmony with it, with White men dominating natives many times their number under a "democratic" constitution. When the proposal for a grant for the College came before the Kenya Legislative Council, their representatives strenuously opposed it. Their point of view was voiced by Mr. Cleland Scott in the Spectator of June 30. Mr. Scott denounces the grants sanctioned by Kenya and Tanganiyika for the Makerere College as "barefaced extortion." He points out that there is no university for the children of European settlers who are unable to afford the fees to send their children to England. He proceeds in language familiar to us in India to suggest that even from the African's point of view the money would be better spent if devoted to teach them "a trade useful to themselves and to the community in general." He writes :

> The unfortunate part is that to-day almost any African who can read and write, considers himself to be a full-fledged karani (clerk) and worth high wages. Again, the general attitude of what might be called the semi-educated African is insolent and of no help to him in life.

Incidentally he complains of the conduct of the Indian members of the Kenya Legistative Council in voting with the Government on this question. He says that they did so not because they have the interests of the natives at heart but "rather that it made one more lash in the whip for scourging the White Settlement." He pities their want of foresight because if "the African is really to advance it is obvious that it is he who in time should fill the posts of station masters, postmasters, goods-clerks, guards and office jobs in the Government services to the detriment of the Indian fraternity." For our part we are proud of the action of Indian representatives in the Kenya Council who supported the Government proposal even though it may eventually oust them from the jobs which they now monopolise.

What will be the reaction in South Africa to the declared policy of the British Government to train the Africans in East Africa to govern themselves? The South African policy in regard to the native Africans is notorious. The Union Government is sure to exert all its influence to obstruct the progress of the new policy. They have been hoping to extend their policy throughout Africa. That can not now be done if the training of Africans in self-government remains the policy of the British Government. Africans from South Africa will join the Uganda College. They will graduate from the University when it becomes one. They will not be content to remain in their present repressed condition in their own country. The declaration of His Majesty's Government opens up a new and bright prospect for African natives. We trust that Indians will continue consistently to support the prosecution of the policy in the interests of their motherland as well as the country of their adoption. In an article on the same subject in a later Spectator, Sir Donald Cameron expresses his belief that Indians will send their children to the Makerere University College. We are sure they will.

SOCIAL DISORGANISATION IN INDIA—I

(By Kewal Motwane, Advar.)

Before we begin, we should define the word culture, since we shall use it quite frequently during the course of this paper. By culture, we mean something more than what Matthew Arnold meant, "the study of perfection, the disinterested search for sweetness and light" which consists "in becoming something rather than in having something, in inward condition of mind and spirit, not in outward set of circumstances." Culture, in sociological parlance, means, as Tylor defined it, "that complex whole which includes knowledge, belief, arts, morals, law, custom and other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society." By culture, we mean the totality of group life, both in its subjective as well as objective aspects. Culture is the tool-making, institution-making and value-making ability of men. Culture is a human product, no other sentient species is known to have culture in this sense.

Cross-fertilisation of cultures, technically called acculturation, is a constant phenomenon in human history. Cultures, like human beings, migrate from one region to another. Indian culture, for instance, has been the most migratory of its kind. It is said to have gone into practically every country of the ancient world from Japan to Britain. But during the modern times, with the quickened means of communication between different parts of the world, the pace of acculturation becomes considerably accelerated. In every nation of the world, a process of cultural fusion is going on. Indeed, there is fast emerging a uniform culture-pattern throughout the world, with almost similar social attitudes and modes of behaviour.

Now, two types of cultures, with vastly different ideologies and values have come face to face in India and are engaged in a deadly combat. India with a rural, agricultural, handicraft culture, with an integrated view of life, with its emphasis on indefinable, qualitative values, on individual uniqueness, on dharma, on self-imposed poverty, on social synthesis, on subjective broad-based nationalism, on man and not the machinery of government, on life of religious experience, unfoldment and tolerance, on power through repose, is confronted by a culture that stands for science and machine, for an urbanised mechanised order, for an analytical view of life with its emphasis on neurosis and complexes, for mass production, for quantitative values of life, for struggle for existence and survival of the fittest, for accumulation of wealth and economic imperialism, for assertive arrogant nationalism, for democracy and dictatorship, for religion of scientific humanism and rationalism. This culture of science and machine has taken a firm grip of India and is slowly seeping into her soul.

This conflict of cultures, this process of acculturation, is producing a considerable amount of social disorganisation. Let us take an example. When the steam-engine, a trait of material culture of science and machine, came to India, it not only served to knit the various geographical units into an organic whole, but it also affected our social attitudes and organisation. It struck a death-blow at our caste system. All castes, high and low, began rubbing shoulders at the railway station and in the train compartment. The process of communication became accelerated, and social distance between various groups of people, artificially maintained by tradition and custom, began to take to wing. Our static society began to yield before the machine of the West. The caste system began to run away on the wheels of the train, the tram and the automobile. Communication is the heart and soul of all social and cultural change, as Professor Cooley, of the University of Michigan, pointed out many years ago.

India's life has gone through a considerable amount of transformation during the last hundred years or so. The culture of science and machine has come to stay with us, with all its products and processes. Cheap Manchester fabrics and prints have ousted the village weaver, now Manchester itself is being ousted by the Indian Manchesters of Ahmedabad, Bombay and Madras. Village sugar industry was crushed out by imported sugar; that, in its turn, is replaced by indigenous sugar industry, with enormous capital invested in it. The American kerosine oil replaced oil from the hand-press of the village. Village potter and brass-ware have yielded their places to aluminium and enamelled iron-ware of local and foreign makes. Every industry of the village has been affected. Mechanized, large-scale agriculture is beginning to make its appearance and the signs of its displacing the peasant are on the horizon. The village smithy is being replaced by the modern repair-shop. The village craftsmen are leaving their hereditary occupations on account of foreign competition. There is a migration of labour to cities. The railways have destroyed economic self-sufficiency of the village. The old system of barter and payment of wages in kind has yielded before the money-economy. The village, which is the basic unit of our culture, is in ruins, and unemployment is rising every day.

The city is prospering at the cost of the village. Cities are growing in number and size. They combine financial, industrial and educational functions, as do the cities of the west. The mill centres, the engineering work-shops, the leather factories, the jute mills, these and other specialised centres of industry are rising in India very rapidly. The machine has raised its mausoleums of coal, smoke, iron and steam, of dirt, squalor and over-crowding, of coolie-lines and human ware-houses, in our country also. The voluntary, spiritual, co-operative communism of the village in which all the groups worked together for mutual welfare, has disappeared, and India is today broken up into two camps, arrayed against each other: capital and labour. Look where we will, we meet with this one problem in one form or another. The big landlord, the zamindar, the petty raja, or the industrialist on the one hand, and the hari, the peasant, the kisan or the wage-earner on the other. Strikes, lock-outs and sabotage are as common here as in the industrialised west. Conflict, not co-operation, is the basic pattern of our lives today. India is fast being dominated by Marxian philosophy of class-conflict and materialistic interpretation of history. The capitalistic class is undoubtedly a formidable group, already opposed to the interests of labour. Some of the legislation of socialistic hue, rushed through the various provincial legislatures and the amount of opposition it has given rise to, bear testimony to the extent to which class-conflict has gone in India. Industrialism, capitalism, class-war, this is the natural sequence. Once science and machine have gained admittance into a nation, they must move on in their relentless course. This is one of the socio-logical laws. A simple trait of culture, accepted by a group of people from another group, will send repercussions throughout the social life. There is no retreat, no matter how much the group may shut its eyes. More science and more machine, but both yoked to India's welfare, this is the only sane attitude.

Another very powerful factor, contributing to our social disorganisation, is the rapid increase in our population. Though our death rate is as high as 22 per thousand, the birth rate is 35; Our population in 1941 will shoot up to four hundred million, nearly twice as much as it was in 1881. Since 1921, the rate of growth has been a little over one percent per annum. The life expectancy is very poor, 25 years compared with 55 years in U. S. and 58 in New Zealand. The average stature and weight of an Indian is diminishing. The amount of land used in India to produce food for an individual is ·34 acres, while it is 2·20 in Britain! Such a great pressure of population on land must mean a steady decline in the fertility of soil as well as low standard of living, considering India's politically subordinate position at present. But we still continue to multiply our numbers indiscriminately, we have no intelligent policy for controlling birth-rate, and we insist on exporting our surplus population abroad, thus creating serious inter-empire and international complications.

With the rural life uprooted, with the land-man ratio upset, struggle for existence must grow keener. Science and machine are no friends of the family institution. They are dealing sledge hammer blows to the sanctity of marriage wherever they have gone. Divorce and abortion put in their appearance and women clamours for rights. The modern movie, a new contraption of science and machine, takes a hand in the game and puts virtue on the defence. Under such circumstances, the woman of India stands the danger of being a replica of her sister of the west, utterly oblivious of the great destiny of uplifting man. Cinema actresses of Hollywood and Gaumont brand will soon replace Sita and Savitri. Glamour so graphically depicted on the screen and the seductive arts so well portrayed on the stage, combine with contributions in journals and magazines in teaching the arts of make-up and the psychology of developing attractive personality, must mean a good-bye to modesty that has been one of the chief characteristics of Indian womenhood. The joint family system is breaking up, as it broke up in Europe when industrial civilisation set in. Family like the village, is a primary group. An individual finds his place, his locus standi there and becomes a person. Torn from the moorings of these primary groups, he becomes a physical and spiritual nomad. Walking, cycling, motoring round the world, are all signs of restlessness in a mechanised order. Fantastic experiments in marriage, disintegration of joint family, increase in divorce, abortion, all have their roots in science and machine.

Social diseases, which came to us from the west, are now no longer confined to sea-ports and large cities, but are invading our rural regions as well. The health and vitality of our nation are at a low ebb and cannot stand comparison with those of any other country in the world. Fortunately, we are just waking up to the necessity of reverting to our indigenous systems of medicine which are comparatively more efficacious and economical than those of the west. But the day when every man, woman, and child in need of medical attendance will get it, is still far off. Cancer, known to be the disease of civilisation, is beginning to be common in India. Malaria, plague, cholera, kala-azar, though partially controlled, still take a heavy toll of mortality in India. Artificial rejuvenation, lust of life which is death, is becoming quite common in India.

Movie houses multiply by the dozen in large cities, and travelling picture-shows are invading our rural regions. The Ras-Lila, the travelling theatre of India which dramatised the religious and spiritual lore of India, is fast disappearing. Our people witness movies screened in India or abroad but they are cast in alien spirit, and there is an emotional response that is not Indian in tone. Everything is being westernised, mechanised. Profit-making motive is taking possession of arts and entertainment. Our daily metropolitan newspaper gives more space to sports, games, races, sex, cinema, stocks and shares than to actual news.

Crime, which is an unfailing index of social disorganisation, is on the increase. Train and mail robberies, bank robberies, rape, kidnapping, hold-ups, traffic in women and children, are quite common in India now, and the papers publish the news in flaring head-lines. If we read the official reports submitted during the last year by the Inspector-Generals of Police of the various provinces, we find one and all complaining of the rise in crime. The criminal in India emulates his colleague of the west whose exploits he sees in the cinema, and presses science into service. Hatchets and daggers are being replaced by guns and pistols stolen from government armouries. When the embargo over the arms is removed by the Government and the volatile temperament of the tropics get control of them, it will be a much worse situation.

A THOUGHT FOR PARENTS.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

According to a news from village Bhimsa in Patna State, which appeared in the Amrita Bazar Patrika of the 18th July 1939, a son without hands and legs has been born to one Kirtan Patel of that village. Ten years ago he had another son, who died at the age of one, since when, during the nine intervening years, the childless parents prayed earnestly to Lord Jagannath for the blessing of a child. A child now they have got, and though the child has no arms and legs it has otherwise normal health.

Most people will no doubt pass over the news as no more than a mere freak of nature. Even the rationalists, who enquire into the causes of ordinary happenings, will probably not feel inclined to think that the above so-called freak must also have some reason behind it. It is such non-inquisitive and non-investigating mentality, which has kept us in the dark about many truths and many happenings in Nature. While the unsophisticated attribute things, which are beyond their comprehension, to supernatural causes and pass their belief down to progeny thus preserving their experience from oblivion, the sophisticated mind rejects as silly and superstitious whatever does not come within the four corners of its limited field of experience. Even many leading thinkers and scientists, who are expected to keep an open mind for everything, are found to be most conservative in respect of things, the novelty and strangeness of which perplex them. By rejecting their probability and discouraging any search for truth in them these thinkers and scientists, inspite of their other contributions to world thought and world knowledge, have often been instrumental in causing the loss of much precious knowledge coming through the experience of man in different countries and at different times.

Now, about the birth of the above child with incomplete body it should be remembered that Lord Jagannath of Puri, to whom the child's parents prayed for nine years for a child is Himself without arms and legs. The very strange resemblance between the physical form of the Deity prayed to and of the child should provoke thinking, for it sugg... that an image which holds the imagination ... a mother goes to influence the child born of ... would they get from parents, whose eyes now and then revert to pictures of half-nude immoral people hanging in bed-rooms and sitting-rooms, whose mind leaps with delight at the thought of going into a dark and crowded cinema-hall to see on the screen some obscene movements of characterless, virtue-selling people and who pass their lives in mere ease and comfort free from all restraint, rejecting as silly superstition all moral, ethical, and religious taboos and disciplinary rules of living and conduct which may come in the way of their smooth enjoyment of life?

I ask all parents to deliberate deeply over the above points, instead of wanting to belittle the significance of my observations regarding film stars' wall pictures, etc. Let them remember, unless of course they look upon children as unhelpable bye-products of their union and not as its divine aim and purpose, that their thoughts and mentality are transmitted to their children, for which reason they owe it to them to keep their thoughts and outlook always pure and noble. For such purity of thought they must keep away from bad sights and unwholesome association and environment. Avoid seeing bad pictures and the faces of characterless unprincipled people. Remove all bad pictures from your rooms, and put there instead pictures of men and women who do not excite your animal instincts but inspire you with pure and reverential thoughts about men and women. When once the father of a boy, four years old, went to a clergyman for advice regarding the boy's education and upbringing, the clergyman exclaimed, "Oh, you have come to me too late, you should have come long before the birth of your son, so as to receive good education yourself."

That holy man had said a great truth, the truth of which I want to impress most strongly on all parents. If you believe you can depend on good teachers and good schools for educating your children well and for developing noble instincts in them, you are sadly mistaken. They can ably rub and polish but cannot alter the material of which the children are made. It is the parents alone who can determine that material, by regulating their lives well on high principles and by purefying and elevating their thoughts under the influence of high ideals and ennobling surroundings. It is a great privilege and the highest object of life to be productive of noblest specimens of humanity through your body and mind, and no amount of what you may call self-denial of pleasure involved in a life of scrupulous self-discipline and strict virtue can be too much for that object. Such watchful self-discipline and virtuous living are not only the sine qua non of you individual progress and perfection, but they will also entail supreme satisfaction at the thought of your having lived nobly and usefully yourself and your having been instrumental in the constructive creation of human divinities, who will bring real peace and happiness to troubled humanity.

CANADIAN APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL.

A correspondent writes from London :—

"I read with interest the paragraph in The Indian Social Reformer of the 24th June, relating to Canada and the Privy Council. I am not sure that you can speak as positively, of the rarity of Canadian appeals to the Privy Council. I have just been looking up the figures. In 1936, for the first three terms of the years there were 8, but the fourth term gave another 12—20 in all. The corresponding figures in 1937 were 12, 5 and 17. For 1938 they were 8, 4 and 12, and for the first three terms in 1939 they are 10, with the number of the fourth term not yet known."

THE "REFORMER" AND THE COMMUNAL PROBLEM.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the twenties, as a fresher in the College, I made my first acquaintance with The Reformer. Ever since then I have turned to its pages for comments on current events for enlightenment and instruction. But there is one problem of which The Reformer does not seem to have the proper grasp. Its comments relating to it appear to me to be doctrinaire and theoretical. It is the communal problem. To emphasise the supreme importance of this problem I can do no better than to quote from the leading article in its latest issue :

> Communities represent the bed-rock of Indian life. Communal interests in the minds of millions override economic interests. The villager, Hindu, Muslim or Christian, will spend several years' earnings on a communal function without a thought of the hardship which the extravagance will entail on him for the rest of his life-time. He lives, thinks and acts in terms of communal life. The communal interest in fact is the only interest he cares for.

On another page we find, "The people of India are a nation of communities."

This is excellent so far as it goes (though I feel that there is a little confusion between 'communal' as contrasted to individual and 'communal' as the term is used in Indian political parlance.) But it is not the whole thing. The Reformer considers that the communal problem is a problem of minorities, whether the minority is Hindu or Muslim. Lest I misrepresent its position—and I know that every word used in The Reformer is carefully weighed—I quote from its note on "Communalism" in the latest issue :

> It is obvious that it would be impossible to satisfy the Muslim League in the Congress Provinces or Hindu politicians in Muslim provinces without violating the principle of administration and injuring not only the majority and lesser minority communities but the interests of the provinces as a whole. We do not see why the acid test of a good administration should be the number of appointments which fall to the minority community. Why should a civil engineer, a doctor or teacher be regarded as more fitted for a post in a secular government because he happened to be born—for a continuing faith is not required—in a particular community? Nobody pretends that a Hindu or a Muslim appointed to satisfy quota requirements is chosen because he is a Hindu or a good Muslim. Everybody suspects that he is a bad engineer, a bad doctor or an indifferent teacher.

This is much too doctrinaire. What is more is that it ignores actual realities—a very unusual thing in The Reformer. Is The Reformer in a position to substantiate that Hindu politicians in Muslim provinces cannot be satisfied without violating every principle of administration? I know of no authoritative Hindu organisation and no responsible Hindu reader who has made demands that justify this sweeping accusation. It has been the boast, and an eminently justifiable boast, of the Mahasabha that it has never departed even by the fraction of an inch from the strait path of nationalism. Bhai Parmanand is one of the extremest, if not the extremist, of the Hindu leaders. What is his position? I have known him intimately, and have worked with him, for years. He stands for one principle, whatever that principle, may be, to be applied throughout India. If it is pure nationalism, let it be so. If it be on population basis, let that be the basis applicable throughout the country. If it be weightage, let that weightage be given to minorities in all provinces. What Bhaiji is deadly opposed to is the policy of "heads you win, tails I lose" policy that the Congress has followed, with such tragic failures, vis-a-vis the Muslims. I consider Bhaiji's position to be eminently just and reasonable. And I repeat that Bhaiji is supposed to the extremest Hindu leader. I ask again is The Reformer's accusation justified?

Let us then take the question of services. I am sick of the cheap jibe about "seats and services." Seats and services do matter in the political economy of any country and only those living in a fool's paradise can ignore them. Bengal's politicians did live in such a fool's paradise and we have the result before our very eyes. The Reformer is mistaken when it thinks that the acid test with the Hindu politicians is the number of appointments which fall to the minority community. No Hindu leader or Hindu organisation has ever proposed this so-called acid test. The question is when efficiency ceases to be the sole test, and when comparatively inefficient people seek entry into the services on the ground of belonging to the minority or the majority community (and not on the ground of merits)—depending on whether it is a Muslim minority province or a Muslim majority province,—what is going to be the "acid test"? Are the minorities to be denied entry into the services on the ground of being a minority and inspite of superior efficiency? That is the question. That this is the question should be clear to the most casual reader of newspapers who has read the debate on the service question in the Bengal Assembly or the memorandum of the Hindu deputationists to the Bengal Governor. Again, in the services there are not merely doctors, engineers and teachers but administrators and executive officers. What becomes of the administration of which the administrators are chosen on tests in which efficiency and impartiality occupy a secondary place?

The Communal problem is the Muslim problem, pure and simple. The problem is euphemistically called protection of minorities where the Muslims are in a minority. In the Muslim majority provinces, it is a problem not for the protection of the Hindu minority but for assuring the privileges to the majority Muslim community. For more than half a century our political leaders have applied their blind eye to the telescope and refused to face the problem squarely. One of the reasons undoubtedly have been that the most eminent leaders of our political thought have hailed from the Hindu majority provinces and have never understood the Muslim mentality. Even to-day when the partition of the country on communal lines has almost become practical politics, the big guns in the Congress prepare to repose in the land of the lotus-eaters. I might get the retort that Bengalis have guided the Congress for long and that Bengal is a Muslim majority province. My answer is that Bengal was not a Muslim majority province till 1912 and that even then the intellectual and economic ascendancy of the Bengali Hindu community was so supreme that nobody could imagine that Bengal was a Muslim majority province.

I plead with The Reformer to take up a realistic attitude towards the Communal problem. In these days of monopolistic Congress Press, with its pet theories and shibboleths, The Reformer is one of the very few journals that stand for independent thought. Let us grasp the real nature of the ploblem and then perhaps we may find a solution. The very fact that the efforts of more than half a century have deepened the problem instead of making the part towards solution shows that there is yet no real understanding of the problem.

Delhi,
July, 27, 1939.

Yours etc.,
B. BANERJI.

[The passages our correspondent quotes from The Reformer relate to two different subjects: the basis of Franchise and appointments in the public Services. As regards the first, our view is that so long as Indians think communally they will vote communally whether the electorates are joint or separate, and that joint electorates can not educate people out of the communal outlook whose roots lie deep down in the sub-conscious mind. It is, therefore, purely a matter for a minority community whether it wants to vote in joint electorates like the Parsis in Bombay or in separate electorates as Muslims all over the country. But there should be no weightages in either case either as a reward for coming into joint electorates or as an inducement to remain in separate electorates.

As regards appointments in the Public Service, it should be immaterial what religion a man professes so long as he is competent for his duties and is honest and impartial in dealing with communities. To appoint a man to a post for which his qualifications are not the best among the different candidates available or to retain him there when he is dishonest and is inspired by communal bias, is to lower the standard of the Service and to bring the administration into discredit.—Ed., I. S. R.]

LEAGUE OF NATIONS PUBLICATIONS.

A reader in Geneva remarks :—

"I have read the comment you have made in The Indian Social Reformer of June 24th, 1939 (p. 674 column : 2) on the League of Nations' Third Annual Report on Child Welfare.

"It might interest you to know that the Report on Child Welfare is based on the documents furnished by different Governments to the League of Nations Secretariat. From a constitutional point of view, I gather, it is not posible for the Social Welfare Activities Section of the League of Nations Secretariat to incorporate in the Report any other documents. In these circumstances, when a Government fails or refuses to supply any "Annual Progress Report" there inevitably occur gaps. The position of League Officials is very much like that of officials working in various Government Secretariats. They may or may not like the policy of this or that Government, but in compiling their publications they have to adhere to what the Governments supply to them. This will explain why the "page devoted to India contains a very perfunctory account of what is being done" in India and why there is no information regarding Soviet Russia where—as you say—"important developments are in progress on social problems including Child Welfare." By the way, Japan no longer co-operates in the League's social welfare work."

PROHIBITION METHODS IN THE UNITED PROVINCES.

An article in Public Information, U. P., enunciates the basic principles of the excise policy followed by the Government: Its aim is to achieve complete prohibition throughout the province within the shortest span of time.

The present Government came with a pledge that such temptation should be removed in order that the people may live a normal life. As such no cost could be considered to be high enough for this Government to discharge in primary obligation. At the same time, the Government could not believe that people could be made moral overnight by acts of the Legislature alone. It also knew that a system that had continued for a long time and sapped the vitals of a perceptible number of people could not be uprooted in a day. The Government, therefore, sought to mobilize public opinion by propaganda and education in order to create a powerful social urge for total prohibition. The Government also counted on the knowledge of the public that temperance propaganda was of no avail unless restrictive measures by the Government were there to reinforce it. The excise policy of the Government was based on this principle.

So on 1st April, 1939, the prohibition experiment was extended to Budaun, Farrukhabad, Bijnor and Jaunpur. The first two districts form compact areas with Etah and Mainpuri which had had one year's experience. The enlightened opinion in these districts in favour of temperance demanded prohibition. As the areas did not border on any Indian State the danger of smuggling did not exist to the same extent as elsewhere. In Bijnor and Jaunpur ground had already been prepared by the introduction of state-managed agency which had greatly reduced the consumption during the last year.

Apart from the special provisions for "charas" and opium addicts, as well as for the use of intoxicants for medicinal use, the following measures were adopted:

(A) Reduction of shops by about 20 to 25 per cent, varying district-wise according to local conditions.

(B) Fixing of retail prices appreciably above those which ruled in different localities. In the previous year, the prices had been considerably raised. This year the prices have been allowed to remain at last year's level. In the case of "charas" the retail sale price and the issue price have been raised by Rs. 20 per seer.

(C) State-managed agency: Last year this system was introduced in Allahabad, Lucknow, Jaunpur and Bijnor, whereas in Benares it was in force in regard to drugs. This year prohibition was introduced in Jaunpur and Bijnor whereas in Allahabad and Lucknow state-agency continued, and in other important centres, extended. Last year's experience showed that state-managed agency resulted in a considerable reduction in the profit-making motive on the part of the licensees, which more than any other single factor was responsible for the increase of sales by resorting to illicit practices. The increase in temperance on the part of those who were used to intoxicants could be clearly traced to this system, as can be proved by the fact that the fall in consumption in the areas under the state-managed agencies was twice as large as the fall in the other areas of the province.

(D) The Government introduced the system of auction with fixed retail prices last year and it continues this year. It has been asserted in certain quarters that the system of auctioning liquor shops which was introduced some years ago, has been continued by the present Government. But it is not true. The auction system continues but with a difference, namely, with fixed retail prices. The surcharge system was produced in the province in 1922 with high hopes. It was altered to the present auction system without any fixed retail prices about ten years later, in the case of liquor licences, and a couple of years after that in the case of drugs licence also. The auction system resulted in an enormous increase of consumption of all intoxicants. In certain places the retail sale prices were below even the economic level. alternative system which the Government had to consider was the surcharge system and for a long time the Government were considering the desirability of going back to it. But ten years of the working of that system did not inspire confidence and it was felt that to go back to it would mean no advance on the conditions which existed before 1922-32.

It was thought inadvisable to go back to the surcharge system. Therefore the possibility of introducing the auction system in an improved form was examined. The first improvement, as has been stated above, consisted in fixing the retail sale price at a level substantially higher than the rates of last year under the auction system and in certain cases even higher than what prevailed under the surcharge system. The second improvement consisted in the issue of instructions by the Government that auctions would in future be conducted in a strictly fair and impartial manner.

Thus it will be seen that a combination of intensive propaganda by the Government and the public, the reduction of shops, the improvement of the auction system by fixing retail prices, and the state-managed agency, are the basic principles of the new excise policy which is directed towards the goal of total prohibition.

CANADA AND PROHIBITION.*

It will have been noted by all Temperance and Prohibition workers, as well as by a much larger public, that the world press did not fail to recognise the significance of their Majesties' landing at Charlottetown, on June 14th last, which, though it was in the most inclement weather, after two hours' bad crossing from Nova Scotia, brought them to the only dry Province in the Dominion—Prince Edward Island. Three-quarters of the island's entire population—a crowd of 60,000—came out into the streets to meet them. This was the Province where the people, election after election, despite overtures from and pressure and invasion by the Liquor Interests, remain true to Prohibition, and here, jubilant at the presence of royal visitors, came the children in their thousands—children who will maintain the integrity of their State in the days to come.

At the Provincial Buildings an address of welcome was read by the Prime Minister of the island, the Hon. T. A. Campbell, who expressed the hope that their Majesties would come back again and bring with them their two daughters, Princess Elizabeth and Princess Margaret. In reply the King said that he hoped to do so for "the life of the citizens of Prince Edward Island exhibits blessings which abound where democratic principles flourish in an atmosphere of tolerance and goodwill."

It is probable that to no other official function during the whole of the Royal Tour, extending into many thousands of miles, would the following press notice be applicable :—

"The drinks served at luncheon were non-alcoholic, Prince Edward Island being the only Canadian Province where Prohibition is in force."—Daily Telegram (London).

It was said by John Morley on one occasion that "fidelity to conviction is the mainstay of human advancement," and Prince Edward Island is to be congratulated on its stand for the better way of life —the way free from the pitfalls due to indulgence in alcoholic liquors. Smaller men than those who conduct the public affairs of this Province might have anticipated the visit by suggestions of what is "done on such occasions," but this was not to be expected of a Premier who so recently replied to a deputation that "the Government did not deem it fit to introduce any change in the present Prohibition Law." Prohibition is the policy of Prince Edward Island, and loyalty is the policy of every right-thinking citizen living there.

This shining example of true citizenship will encourage friends of the Dry Movement all over the world. To-day men and women are torn by dissension and confusion of thought in the political sphere, they see life held cheaply, and note that the words of Governments are not their bond. We do a service to mankind, therefore, when we acclaim right actions which the spirit of Humanity commands. "Thus ought the enthusiasm of Humanity to work in these days," says Seeley in Ecce Homo, "and thus, plainly enough, it does work."

BOMBAY RULES FOR TEMPLE ENTRY.

The rules and form framed by the Bombay High Court for trustees of temples in the province, who intend to throw open the place of worship under their charge to Harijans under the Bombay Harijan Temple Worship Act, are published in the Government Gazette.

All applications under the Act shall be regulated under the Code of Civil Procedure. The declaration opening a temple to Harijans shall be presented to the sitting judge of the High Court in Chambers. If the Chamber Judge is satisfied that the declaration is in order, he shall order it to be taken on file and shall cause public notice to be given and shall cause it to be published in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

After the expiry of three months from the date of the publication, of the declaration, the trustee or trustees shall file in the Court an affidavit of proof of the publication along with a certificate of the Prothonotary and Senior Master, that no application, has been made to set aside the said declaration, and the Court shall on application of the trustee or trustees make the declaration absolute.

This general lowering of the retail sale prices stimulated consumption. Habits of drunkenness increased and use of deleterious drugs assumed dangerous dimensions. These considerations condemned the auction system in its old form. The

GUIDE TO STUDY OF A CHANGING WORLD

The student of modern society in the national or international sphere has been given a valuable guide to the immense resource of documentation which the League of Nations affords him, in a manual recently issued by M. A. C. de Bracha-Vauthier: Sources of Information—a handbook on the publications of the League of Nations.

Professor Shotwell, of Columbia University, says in his preface: "The fact that this (i. e., the League's) collection furnishes materials for the study of domestic problems within the national States as well as those in the field of international relations is already well known to serious students of the sociological, economic and political problems of the modern world. This is not wholly trrue, of course, of the purely technical documents oh agreements which Governments make with each other, but it is true of the realities with which these documents deal. Economics, public health, finance and even questions of security and disarmament are at bottom the expression of national facts and the need for adjustment to other similar fact in a changing world. Nowhere is this fact better illustrated than in the trend of the documents of the League of Nations. They have now become [illegible] indispensable source for the study of major proble[ms] that find expression in national policy to-day."

INDIAN WORKERS IN CEYLON.

The State Council hall was packed to the [illegible] with visitors who gathered to hear from Sir Baron Jayatilaka, Chief Minister, an account of the talks which the Board of Ministers had with Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru. Sir Baron Jayatilaka said.

"The Indian National Congress decided to send one of its most prominent members to Ceylon to study the situation here and report. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru came here and spent ten days meeting all sorts of people, listening to everyone who had something to tell him, addressing public gatherings and also having a number of friendly discussions with the Ministers.

"Even before the arrival of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the Ministers of their own accord considered the question carefully and they came to certain conclusions. In discontinuing from service non-Ceylonese of the first category, the Ministry decided upon a certain course. It was that if a non-Ceylonese was married to a Ceylonese woman, he should not be brought under the operation of the measure, [if] he had not married but had children through a Ceylonese woman, and if he was prepared to marry that woman and register the child or children, he should be exempted. We also came to the conclusion that special cases of hardships must be considered individually. I can mention some of these. Where a spouse entered service after 1934 but the partner had been in service much longer, it would be hard to apply the rule strictly because it would break up a family. We thought it only humane to consider such cases on their merits. We, therefore, decided that in such circumstances, the Minister concerned should review the cases and not the head of the department.

"As regards the second category, in respect of those who have been in service for more than five years, we have come to certain decisions. We thought that the cases of those who have served the Government for more than ten years should be specially considered."

"These," Sir Baron said, "are the decisions we have come to with regard to this question, both before and after Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru arrived. But it is published in certain newspapers that Pandit Jawaharlal came here, made all sorts of impossible demands, and that the Ministers have yielded. I want to repudiate that statement as strongly as possible. Mr. Nehru is a patriot and he would be the last person to ask us in Ceylon to do anything which would be detrimental to the interests of this country. He made no such demand. As a matter of fact, he has said on more than one occasion that the immediate question—the one relating to the question whether a few hundred persons should be sent away or not—is of a trivial character. He wanted to see something done which would not inflict on the affected people any hardship or leave in the minds of the Indian people any sense of hostility. He was more interested in seeing that the friendly relations that have subsisted between India and Ceylon continued than in anything else. He came to us with a message of goodwill and sympathy from the Indian public. There is nothing more than that. Wherever he spoke, Pandit Jawaharlal clearly laid down the principles that should guide even Indians in this island. I think I have said enough on that point to remove the gross misunderstanding that has been given wide publicity to by certain journals."—The Hindu.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Prohibition Day:—The Bombay Government in co-operation with the local Congress organization has organized a mass demonstration on the 1st August when Prohibition comes into force. There will be flag-salutations, open air mass meetings (if the weather permits), processions. The day is to be observed as a public holiday. We feel that all this fuss is both untimely and misplaced. Great social reforms are best begun quietly and without the blowing of trumpets. "The heavens were spread without a word." There are special reasons for inaugurating the Bombay scheme with as little fuss as possible. The scheme as it has emerged, if it can be regarded as final, is not so much Prohibition as a Permission scheme. What is prohibited with one hand is permitted with the other. When the Government announced its plan to attack the drink traffic in one of its biggest strongholds, Bombay city, we applauded their courage in declining the line of least resistance which other Congress Governments have preferred, and supported them wholeheartedly though our own first inclination was in the direction of clearing the districts before approaching the capital. Since the last few weeks the Government policy has steadily tended to be whittled down. Gandhiji's declaration that Prohibition is a misnomer and that all that was intended was to cease licensing liquor shops, was a stunning blow to those who believed that Prohibition meant Prohibition as the term has come to be understood all over the world. We expected Government to come forward with a contradiction or at least an explanation. None has been forthcoming. The rules issued a few days ago by conceding that abstinence from liquor might lead to serious and permanent injury to the health of persons who were not minors, pulled out the biggest block in the foundation of Prohibition. Little is left of Prohibition now in the Government measure. It is safe to say that not many persons need now abstain who have not always done so voluntarily or by force of habit. In any case, there is not much cause for jubilation in the inauguration of this milk-and-water scheme. If we are mistaken, we shall readily apologise but, as we understand it, the scheme to be inaugurated on Tuesday is one not of Prohibition but of Permission. The contemplated celebration is inopportune for another reason. The Excise Minister, Dr. Gilder, has been estranged from his community and there is today talk of a social boycott. Our sympathies always go out to the man who is fighting with his back to the wall. This is what Dr. Gilder has been doing in one sphere and Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose in another. Even if the Prohibition scheme was intact, it would be wise not to put the Excise Minister in a more invidious position than his official duties absolutely entail. There is one another consideration. The Government has yet to obtain full statutory authority for its measure. Unlike other Congress Governments, it has only a precarious majority of four or five in the Legislative Assembly. The Tuesday celebrations will be somewhat in the nature of hallooing before you are out of the wood.

"Sweet Toddy":—Dr. Sokhey, Director of the Haffkine Research Institute, issued last week a report of the analysis of "sweet toddy" which was made at the Institute at the instance of the Bombay Government. It may be recalled that Gandhiji came out suddenly some weeks ago with an encomium of nira or toddy which he had taken to be free from alcohol, and was surprised to learn from a licensed victuallers' deputation that the stuff he was sipping contained 6 per cent alcohol while beer contained less than 4 per cent. Some nationalist scientists at once came out with a contradiction of the licensed victuallers' allegation. The Government of Bombay wanted apparently to make sure of the actual contents of nira and they put the work in the hands of the Haffkine Institute. Dr. Sokhey's report substantially bears out the truth of the licensed victuallers' allegation. Sweet toddy juice, he says, ferments rapidly unless special methods are used to prevent the process. The Institute has devised a method which will keep the toddy not only unfermented for any length of time, but will preserve its taste, and will prevent its ill-odour. The Institute is arranging to produce this sterilised toddy in quantities and to put it on the market as Government want to make available to the public this health-giving drink with its nutritive value unimpared. This value consists chiefly in a liberal supply of vitamin C which "almost equals the content of lemon juice." The price of lemons in Bombay never exceeds three pies each for small and six pies for large ones. Will a bottle of Haffkinised toddy be sold at a less price? Besides the fresh fruit in all circumstances has many more valuable qualities than bottled stuff however carefully manufactured, for the simple reason that the laboratory of Nature is better equipped than any human laboratory can be for such tasks. Government will be doing more for the health of the people by encouraging and extending the growth of lemons than by having nira treated and bottled in the laboratory and sold under their guarantee that it will never produce intoxication. No such guarantee is needed in the case of lemons, the ideal source of C vitamins, as Nature has endowed it with a sour taste which is a permanent and natural safeguard against excessive use. As in the case of older medical theories there is already a reaction against the vitamin theory. Some days ago we were surprised to read an article by a doctor on vitamin poisoning. Since the above was in type, it is announced that the Bombay Government has decided to sell Haffkine toddy as an "aerated water." No one, we trust, will contract the nira habit because Government wants people to do so. It will be a bad habit at the best and may have consequences which are not patent to the scientist in his laboratory. Dr. Sokhey's conclusions, we see, have been contraverted by another scientist.

Reform in Indian States:—The Indian Conciliation Group in London of which Mr. Carl Heath is Chairman and Miss Agatha Harrison is Honorary Secretary, has published a pamphlet entitled "The Indian States: Reform and Federation." Intended as it is for the use of Members of Parliament and the British Press it is necessarily sketchy. Though the facts mentioned in the pamphlet are more or less correct, the inference to which they point, namely, that the present agitation in the States is for the redress of grievances, is not correct. The States where the agitation has been most acute, are the most advanced States in which the standard of administration does not fall short of the standard of British India. Indeed, in some respects they are admittedly ahead of British India. The demand now is for full responsible government with the ruler's powers limited to those of the British sovereign. This demand is supported only by an abstract belief that full responsible government will achieve more for the people than the present system which, in the advanced States, is far from being autocratic. We recently asked a distinguished Indian administrator who is sympathetic to the claims of the States peoples, whether Mysore, for instance, would have made the progress it has if it had parliamentary government for the last thirty years. He thought for a while and replied that he must say that it would not. This claim of the States' politics was countenanced by Congress leaders who their own organization are obliged to adopt Dictator rather than the Democratic mode Gandhiji was dragged into this agitation and found out too late what he had let himself in for He pulled himself out of it with an effort which would have meant the collapse of many others his position and even in his case has involved much loss of public confidence. Whether parliamentary democracy is the best form of Government, is no longer a question admitting of only one answer. Whether it is suited to all conditions and countries, is another question. The Indian situation has changed much even in the few weeks since Miss Agatha Harrison visited India. It has become necessary to form a Conciliation Group here but no one so far is coming forward to form it.

Lord Sinha:—After an unconscionably protracted period of suspense the Committee of the House of Lords entrusted with questions relating to the privileges of peers, has decided that the present Lord Sinha was the "heir male of the body of the late Lord Sinha, lawfully begotten." We reprint the Lord Chancellor's observations as a conspicuous example of British circumlocution. The present Lord Sinha is the eldest son of the late Lord Sinha. No one but a fool or an idiot would think of doubting that fact. But the Attorney-General reported to the King that he was in doubt "whether the evidence produced to him, if accepted, would establish a marriage entitling the petitioner to make pedigree and establish his descent in the Peerage Law from the first Lord Sinha." This doubt has now been solved and Lord Sinha is accepted as the son of his father according to the Peerage Law. The difficulty raised by the Attorney-General seems to have been that Lord Sinha's marriage under the Hindu law was not a monogamous marriage since it was permissible for him under the Hindu law to marry a second or third wife. That the late Lord Sinha did not exercise this permission and marry a second wife, was noted as a point in favour of the petitioner, the present Lord. But it was a subsidiary point, the main one being that, about a year prior to the birth of the petitioner, his father joined the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj which the Lord Chancellor described as a sect one of whose tenets (?) was monogamy. Indian courts, he added, would not recognize the validity of a second marriage while a Brahmo continued to be a member of the sect and the first wife was alive. With due respect to the authority of the highest judicial functionary in England we doubt if this is more than an obiter dictum. We believe that Brahmos as a rule are monogamous but we are not sure that, if a Brahmo married a second wife when his first wife was living, the Courts in British India would not recognise the second marriage as valid, unless the first marriage was registered under the Special Marriage Act of 1872 which is entirely unrelated to the tenets of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj. The tenets of the Arya Samaj as promulgated by its Founder included strict monogamy, but nowadays polygamous marriages are performed under the recently passed Arya Marriage Validation Act and the authorities of the Samaj seem to be absolutely unconcerned.

Britain in the Far East:—Mr. Neville Chamberlain, the British Prime Minister, gave the House of Commons on Monday the text of the agreement reached between Mr. Arita and Sir. Robert Craigie at Tokyo. The Japanese had insisted on such an agreement as a preliminary to the Anglo-Japanese talks over Tientsin. The agreement reads:

> His Majesty's Government fully recognize the actual situation in China where hostilities on a large scale are in progress, and note that, as long as that state of affairs continues to exist, the Japanese forces in China have special requirements for the purpose of safeguarding their own security and maintaining public order in regions under their control and that they have to suppress or remove any such causes or acts as will obstruct them or benefit their enemy. His Majesty's Government have no intention of countenancing any acts or measures prejudicial to the attainment of the above-mentioned objects by the Japanese forces, and they will take this opportunity to confirm their policy in this respect by making it plain to British authorities and British nationals in China that they should refrain from such acts and measures.

The Japanese have reason to rejoice at this achievement. Some idea of the importance attached by Japan to it can be had by the fact that a day before its official release the Japanese Premier gave an interview to the Press in which he furnished the Japanese view of the Arita-Craigie agreement. He was not quite accurate when he said that the understanding implied abstinence from helping independent China. One cannot escape the feeling that the agreement as it stands is much more than a general statement of British policy towards China in the present Sino-Japanese hostilities. In the first place, it is the first official recognition of the hitherto "undeclared war." In the second, it implies British recognition of the Japanese Government in the areas which she has taken by force, and almost an offer of help to Japan in the difficult task of administering these territories. And lastly, while it does not commit Britain to a policy of denying credits to Chiang Kai-shek's Government it does impose on Britain abstinence from any anti-Japanese act. For some months Japan has been anxious to consolidate her position in China rather than to press further into the interior. The agreement gives her an opportunity to do so. If any doubt is left on the subject, the attitude of China where anti-British feeling is reported to be running high, and the reactions of the United States press should be conclusive. Mr. Chamberlain's explanations in the House of Commons were as usual unhelpful. They fail to convince anybody of the correctness of his intrepretation that the agreement does none of the things it appears to do; at the same time they appear to have increased Japanese suspicions of British intentions to carry out their declared policy honestly. As a result the Tientsin situation continues to be anxious and anti-British demonstrations still occur even in the Japanese-occupied parts of China.

Pandit Jawaharlal's Mission to Ceylon:—On the threshold of his mission to Ceylon on behalf of the Indian National Congress, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru announced that he was not going there with any resentment at or purpose of retaliation against the decision of the Ceylon Government to dispense with the services of some hundreds of Indian workmen employed by them on daily wages. This is exactly what we had commended as the right method of approach to the question. The Ceylonese point of view should be given adequate weight in order to obtain fair consideration for the Indian point of view. This seems to have been done by the Pandit. We agree with him that though the results as far as the immediate question is concerned may not be spectacular, the foundation has been laid for a permanent understanding between the people of Ceylon and the people of India. We look forward like the Pandit to the time when India and Ceylon will be one great political and economic unit as geographically and culturally they have been one. In all our dealings with differences which may arise between the two countries, this goal must be steadily kept in view. India as the larger and more powerful neighbour, should set the example by conceding something more than the legitimate claims of Ceylon. In the present dispute, Ceylon must be conceded her claim to provide work for her own workless people before helping others. This claim is made by and on behalf not only of the Sinhalese section of the Ceylonese population but also of the Tamils who are an influential section in the Northern half of the island, and who are bound closely by ties of language, religion and social intercourse to the people of Tamilnad. That the results of Pandit Nehru's visit are not likely to be negligible is suggested by the rather hysterical outburst of a Sinhalese leader threatening the Ceylon Government with dire consequences if it made my concession, as he feared it might, in consequence of the Pandit's representations. We are sorry that the Government of India have not taken the same conciliatory and far-seeing attitude in this dispute as Pandit Jawaharlal. They seem to have been in a hurry to forestall the Pandit and to show that they are more keen about the matter than the Congress. The breaking off of the Trade negotiations with Ceylon was a precipitate step without precedent. Countries where Indians have more serious grievances have not been rebuffed in a like way.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, July 29, 1939.

COMMUNITIES OR INTERESTS?

The Hyderabad Reforms Committee has devoted several pages to the question of the proper basis of electorates. In discussing it the Committee has not been content to restrict itself to the conditions in Hyderabad State with which alone it was concerned. It now and then indulges in generalisations about India while in some places it insists that Hyderabad conditions are peculiar to itself. The Committee's conclusion regarding communal electorates is inconclusive. The Chairman, Dewan Bahadur S. Aravamudu Aiyangar, wishes to point out > that he does not believe there is anything in the system of territorial representation which should necessarily tend to promote communal rancour. But, without concerning himself with the pros and cons of territorial representation, he desires to make it clear that the considerations which have weighed with him to incline in favour of representation by interests, are that it will dispense with communal representation, separate electorates and other safeguards, and that under this system no single section will be able to secure a predominant majority for itself, and that, if the experiment failed, it should by no means be difficult to resort to another system.

The other Hindu member of the Committee, Mr. Kashinath Rao Vaidya, was more positive. He preferred the territorial system, without any reservation of seats or safeguards on communal lines, and opposed the system of representation by interests as striking at the root of representative Government. The official (Muslim) members of the Commission did not disagree with the view expressed by the Chairman that there is nothing in the system of territorial representation which should necessarily tend to promote communal rancour; but they wished to make it clear that > under conditions existing in India, and particularly in the present atmosphere here (Hyderabad), candidates will very often for the furtherance of their own ends, try to convert territorial constituencies into political arenas of communal rivalry.

As if representatives of "interests" will more easily disinterest themselves in, and will do nothing for the furtherance of, their own ends, economic and communal! All this part of the Report, however, is nullified by the introduction of the dreaded communal bogey under the orders finally passed by his Exalted Highness. Each of the interests specified for purposes of election, it is provided, must send an equal number of Hindu and Muslim representatives while similar equality must exist between the two communities among the nominated members. This is to be done by "convention" and not by statute. So communalism is there after all.

Mr. Vaidya in asking for territorial constituencies without communal or other safeguards was ignoring the hard facts of contemporary life. His proposal, with provision for communal representation or reservation added on, for some obscure reason did not suggest itself to the Committee as a possible alternative. For the political education of the people, a constitution which rests on recognised foundations, is more valuable than one which is based on hypothetical ones. Territorial constituencies with communal reservations would have been better from this point of view than the interests-communal arrangement adopted. We said last week that communal differences are preferable to differences due to economic interests as foundations of a political edifice. In this country communities have lived together for centuries and have evolved a technique for being good neighbours without worshipping in the same shrines and without interdining or intermarrying. The communal "evil" is, therefore, one to which people in this country are acclimatised. 'The conflicts of economic interests," on the other hand, are comparatively unfamiliar to them owing to the system of occupational castes which is the peculiar and, in the opinion of eminent sociologists, an admirable contrivance for avoiding economic class wars which, at present, are found chiefly in highly industrialised parts of the country, of which Hyderabad is fortunately not one. The belief that emphasis on economic interests will divert the mass mind from communal tendencies, is not consonant with everyday experience. The dominant interest of the masses of people being admittedly communal, the communal motive is bound like Aaron's rod to swallow up all other interests. From the administrative point of view also, the interest franchise is more difficult than the communal franchise. A man belongs and can belong only to one community. He is either a Hindu or a Muslim, or a Christian. There is no chance of overlapping. (The Aryas claim to be both a distinct community and a class of Hindus at the same time. But their whole position is ambiguous and for the present they may be left alone.) In the case of "interests," however, the overlapping is present at almost every turn. A lawyer may at the same time be a landlord. A doctor may be a tenant. An educationist may be, and under the scheme of vocational education is bound to be, a handicraftsman. Labourers are not all depressed classes people nor are the depressed classes all labourers. In point of numbers alone, in the case of three or four communities the scheme is weighted with over a dozen interests and we have no doubt that more of them will be coming forward to claim recognition.

There is no man living who has a more whole-hearted repugnance to communalism than Sir Akbar Hydari. In public and in private he has again and again expressed his determination to keep the communal evil out of his constitutional reforms at all costs. Obviously he has been obliged by circumstances beyond his control at the last moment to introduce by a side wind what he was determined should not disfigure the Hyderabad constitution. What those circumstances were can only be briefly indicated. The first was Gandhiji's declaration to the Muslims of Rajkot that he was agreeable to their having separate electorates if they wanted them in that Indian State. The second is the sudden decision of the Congress and Congressmen to force Indian States, even those which had not the rudiments of organised administration, to introduce full responsible government at the risk of letting lose satyagrahis on them. Thirdly, pressure from above to do something that may be put before Parliament and the British public as a step towards constitutional reform. From an abstractand idealistic view, communal electorates represent a higher stage of evolution than interests-electorates.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The great struggle between the so-called democratic and the dictator regimes is for economic interests and economic interests alone. And it is to be borne in mind, in both regimes the nineteenth century figment of the economic man has been ruthlessly eliminated. This is the absorbing feature of the present struggle. The process is analysed and presented with great clarity and conviction in "The End of the Economic Man" by Mr. Peter F. Drucker, which was noticed in the Reformer of July 8. And there is this to consider. The honest communalist lives for something besides himself. The "economic man" has no interest but his own. With education and a widened outlook, there is always hope of a communal-minded person extending the range of his sympathies to his nation and to humanity. There is no such hope in the case of the man of economic interests.

The communal bitterness now pervading Indian politics is not due to separate electorates but to the weightages attached to them. In fact, without weightages communal electorates will lose much of their attraction. The Hyderabad scheme perpetuates the British Indian anomaly with the further complication of economic interests. We may observe in passing that conventions are more difficult to dislodge than statutory obligations, without giving rise to misunderstanding and resentment among the interests concerned. The equal representation provided for Hindus and Muslims whose population ratio in the Nizam's Dominion is 8 to 1, is sought to be justified by historical importance and the precedent of the weightage allowed to Europeans in the British Indian scheme. The Muslims had a great opportunity of welding India into a nation and establishing an empire on the broad basis of nationality. They failed to do so as did the Hindus before and after them, and failed just because they could not sustain the great traditions of Asoka and Akbar, which made no distinction between Hindu and Buddhist, and Muslim and Hindu, regarding both as equal members of the Empire. The significance of historical importance is thus a negative one. Apart from that, there is wisdom in the Shakespearian precept, "Let not virtue seek remuneration for the thing it was." As for the Englishman's franchise in British India, it is admittedly inequitable and is bound to disappear when India takes over full responsibility for her Defence and Foreign affairs. We fully realise that Muslim sentiment in Hyderabad is largely opposed to any change in the present system and that even the equal representation provided for Muslims has not mollified it. It is plain that the Government is not in a position to establish representat ve Government in which Muslims will be a minority community. In the circumstances, it would be better to shift the line of reform to other lines than those of parliamentary democracy, in which our own faith is not unlimited as the best form of Government for India.

We have discussed above the basic principles of the Hyderabad scheme of reforms on more or less theoretical considerations. Theory, however, is distilled experience and any scheme which contravenes it, is prima facie unsatisfactory. We are glad nevertheless that Mr. V. D. Savarkar, President of the Hindu Mahasabha which has been conducting a satyagraha campaign, while conscious of the defects of the scheme, has expressed himself satisfied with it and has conveyed his congratulations to his Exalted Highness and his Government. We commend the spirit which has prompted his prompt action. It shows that he has full faith in the justice of the Hindu cause and in the good will and the desire of the Hyderabad Government to do justice to the largest section of the subjects of His Exalted Highness. The Arya Samaj leaders who profess to be interested only in religious freedom, have not been able to make up their minds. Their conception of religious liberty is extravagant and impracticable, only less so than that of the Shankaracharya of Jyotir Math who wants that the Hindus should be free to iudnlge in the obscene slogans which they are acustomed to shout during the Holi festival. There has been a strong movement in British India which has largely succeeded in putting down this degrading custom and in making Holi a holy season. Hyderabad can not be allowed to wallow in this mire because it has accumulated during several centuries.

Mr. Chamberlain Persists:—The tenacity with which Mr. Chamberlain persists in his peace-at-any-price policy must compel admiration even from his bitterest political opponents. It is this loyalty which has to some extent hindered the negotiations with Soviet Russia. Even at the moment when an Anglo-Soviet Pact seemed very near, the British Premier had not altogether given up hopes of stopping aggression by buying off the aggressors. In Britain's dealings with Japan, there was an added difficulty. As the Spectator frankly put it," the exultation of German and Italian propagandists at our difficulties in China matter little, but the damage to our prestige in India and other parts of Asia matters much. "Of all the reasons for resisting and resenting Japanese indignities, this is about the worst the British could hit upon.

COCHIN.

Cochin has many points in common with Travancore. It has had a common history with that State and it shares the advantages of the same social system. In area Travancore with 7,600 square miles is more than five times the size of Cochin; and its population is 50 lakhs as against Cochin's 12 lakhs. In matters of administration Cochin like Travancore has maintained a high standard. It is interesting to note, in the Administration Report for 1937-38, the pecular characteristics of Cochin which distinguish it from its great neighbour. In the sphere of Education, there is little to choose between Cochin and Travancore, both of whom have made rapid strides particularly in the education of women. The significance of the fact that women's education in Cochin is as far advanced as in her sister State lies in this that Cochin has adopted the policy of separate schools for girls even in the primary classes. The general progress of education among women in both these States, therefore, must be ascribed to the matriarchal system which is common to them both. In religious matters as well Cochin has followed a more conservative policy; the State resisted great pressure, after the Travancore Temple Entry Proclamation, from outside its territories for similar legislation. Yet in the education of the backward communities the Government of Cochin has taken a special interest; the Government helped all depressed class students in secondary schools till recently. But, says the Administration Report, "so rapid has been the increase in the number of pupils that the Government have limited the number of depressed class stipendiaries.....they are exempted from the payment of fees." There is an interesting sidelight on Government's educational policy thrown by the following sentence, "A few backward communities, such as the Kudumi Chettis, Tholkollans and Perumkollans, Kumbarans, Kusavans, Boyans and Velaans, were classed as depressed classes for purposes of educational concessions during the year under report." Cochin State, it is implied both by the reduction of concessions to the depressed classes and by the enlargement of the words "depressed classes", watches the trend of education in different sections of its people and adjusts educational facilities to provide for equal opportunities for all subjects. Other facilities extended to the depressed classes are the provision of house sites, the setting up of colonies, the provision of adequate water supply, co-operative societies, etc.

In opening the Budget Session of the Cochin Legislative Assembly, the Dewan Sir R. K. Shanmukham Chetty delivered a notable address (July 18th). The financial position of Cochin as shown in the Budget figures is an enviable one. The coming year will be the third surplus year in succession. Only strict economy has been able to achieve this without curtailing—on the other hand, actually increasing—expenditure on nation-building departments and without increasing taxation. The "Palace" expenditure is less than 7 per cent of the total revenues. Sir Shanmukham compares the year 1939 with 1929 and observes that there is now an increase of nearly Rs. 12 lakhas in the State's expenditure on the nation-building departments, the only additional burden on the taxpayer being the income and super tax which is expected to yield Rs. 6·5 lakhs. The Port of Cochin has been a veritable gold mine to the State and Sir Shanmukham remarked on the increase in the trade of the port during the year. All work on the Harbour will be completed by January 1940. The reclaimed area which was in dispute, was 775 acres, of which the Cochin State has sold 675 to the Port authorities leased to them the remaining 100 acres. The of 150 acres during the year, reduced the borrowing from the Government of India by Rs. lakhs. The increase in importance of Cochin port in the next few years will obviate the need fresh taxation. The extra financial needs of the will be to a great extent met by the duties paid imported goods, which in the long run fall on consumer.

Sir Shanmukham after a reference to financial position of the State, turned to the work of the Staff Selection Board set up three years for recruitment to the public services; a committee of four non-officials with the Dewan Peishkar, been appointed to look into the work of the Board. The Staff Selection Board, as the Administration Report for 1937-38 shows, aims at satisfying "legitimate demands" of all the communities in State without impairing the efficiency of the service. The Report says:

> Analysed according to communities 103 appointments were secured by Ezhuvas, 70 by other Hindus (backward or depressed), 61 by Romo-Syrians, 41 by Latin Catholics, 32 by other Christians, 82 by Nayars, 52 by other Hindus, 29 by Muslims, 21 by Tiyyas, Brahmins, 10 by Jews, Anglo-Indians, etc., and 15 by Pulayas. Pulayas alone could not derive the benefit of the percentage of appointments assured them because of the want of qualified applicants in their community.

Sir Shanmukham told his Council that that was the official policy. He further took the opportunity to reiterate his faith in the principle of communal justice in questions of representation in the legislatures and in the public services. He said:

> I am clear in my mind that the ideal of nationality in India could be strongly implanted only by a fearless recognition of the principle of communal representation which is an inevitable corollary to the existing social order in India. It is the refusal to accept this inexorable fact of our political life that has led to communal bickerings and strife. The principle of communal representation in India is in no sense an antithesis to nationalism. Amidst the diversities of communities in India, national unity can be achieved only by creating a sense of security and confidence in the mind of all the important communities. This confidence can be created in an effective manner only when all the communities feel that their political and civic liberties are adequately safeguarded in a manner consistent with the existing social order.

To this policy Sir Shanmukham went on to say the State owed the peace and harmony that has prevailed, during the last three years. This bold claim specially since Cochin, before the acceptance of this policy, was particularly known for its communal squabbles. To the casual observer it might appear that Sir Shanmukham's attitude to communal representation stressed an aspect which might conceivably lead to inefficiency. But the extract which we have given above from the Administration Report, leaves no room for such misunderstanding. There is, however, a world of difference between recognising communalism and being obsessed by it. Both Sir Shanmukham and the Cochin State might well consider themselves fortunate in having no minorities which seek representation beyond their proportionate share in the legislatures and in the services, as in British India and in some Indian States.

A large part of the Diwan's speech was devoted to the working of the Constitutional Reforms inaugurated by His Highness on June 17, 1938. Sir Shanmukham remarked that though a third of the Budget was not votable by the Council, the greater part of it was "obligatory expenditure" and would have to be voted by any Council. The really non-votable part was, he said, less than ten per cent of the Budget. In view of the general powers of sanction and veto vested in His Highness, the expedient of withholding even items of "obligatory expenditure" from the vote of the elected legislature is difficult to justify. In referring in his speech announcing the reforms to the example of the British constitutional ruler, His Highness held out hopes that, as the people of Cochin gained experience, the system of diarchy would give place to complete responsibility. That was the most effective defence of the system introduced in the State—that it was transitional. The Minister who was appointed in the first year, was the leader of the popular party in the Legislature, and the Diwan announced that there had been no reason for the exercise of the reserve powers, either of the Maharaja or of the Diwan. Unlike other Indian States, Cochin by the introduction of the 1938 Constitution has deliberately accepted as its ideal the British Indian system of popular government and in the near future the State will approximate to the British Indian provinces in administration. Sir Shanmukham referred with justifiable pride to Cochin's independent judiciary and to the absence of repressive laws and Star Chamber methods in the State. Along with the new Reforms, a High Court presided over by a Chief Justice and two judges was established in 1938 in Cochin.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE TEXT-BOOKS.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

It is a happy sign of national awakening that the need for reform in the educational system and conditions prevailing in the country is being increasingly realised. Education is not yielding satisfactory results; the money and years spent on it are far from commensurate with its economic and material achievements in later life; it does not develop self-confidence and the spirit of courageous enterprise —these and such other complaints are heard more and more. The swelling bulk of educated unemployed is, moreover, adding discontent to the above mere critical complaint.

As a solution some people have proposed that academic education should be supplemented by some vocational education. Going deeper into the matter, Gandhiji has conceived the idea of reforming and extending the primary stage of education, and his conception has developed into a comprehensive scheme, that is popularly known as the Wardha Scheme.

While thus complaints are made about the failure of the prevailing system of education to fit youngsters for the economic struggle in later life and suggestions for remedying the apparent defects are being offered, the cultural, the character-building and the outlook-forming aspect of education is, however, being rather overlooked. An important object of education is, no doubt, the development of faculties, which are needed in establishing oneself in life, but it has also to aim at building character; forming high and pure ideals and imparting knowledge uncoloured by prejudice and undistorted through wrong perspective. For such purpose the selection of good text-books is of great importance. But unfortunately the selection of text-books is left to committees the members of which are often uninterested in and ill-informed of the subject in which they prescribe books. Canvasing, open and underhand, by text-book writers makes matters still worse. Over and above, the policy of the Government has been unhelpful, if not something more, in good text-book selection. Mrs. Annie Besant once said in a lecture that, while reading a school history book, she found it stated about the second Sikh War that the battle had ended in a draw, while she knew that the truth was that it had resulted in a defeat of the English. Surprised at the misstatement, she said she turned to the title-page of the book where it was written that the book was meant for Indian schools. She smiled and added that on reading that she understood why the misstatement about the battle having ended in a draw instead of an English defeat, was made in the book. Indian boys should grow up under the impression that the English were unbeatable, that a few hundreds of the English could repulse and defeat thousands of Indian soldiers, that they were superior to Indians in every way. How could Indians educated and brought up under such education from their early boyhood, develop self-confidence and a sense of equality, not to say of superiority as against their present rulers? Mrs. Besant very pertinently asked, and she went on to give the picture of the English schools, where boys were given to read the life stories of the English heroes, in which the bravery and achievements of those heroes were greatly exaggerated, brilliantly coloured. They read of Nelson's skill and bravery; they were taught that Wellington was the victor of Napoleon (of course, they did not read what an English lady writer, Hamilton, had written about the great Duke, namely, that "to talk of Wellington as the victor of Napoleon is to insult the intelligence of man"). Such reading inspired them with confidence in themselves and in their race, pointed out Mrs. Besant, for they felt that the race-blood that had flowed in the veins of Nelson and Wellington flowed in their veins too. What wonder then, that when an English boy and an Indian boy met, they met on most unequal terms and under greatly different advantages of education, the one inspired by individual and race confidence and the other cowed down by knowledge of race inferiority. This inferiority complex continues beyond boyhood and persists throughout the life of most of the Indians. I once saw an English boy giving chase to about half a dozen Indian boys of his age none of whom had the courage to turn back and challenge the attacker. The fact that in a quarrel between an Indian and an Englishman the former seldom gets justice and gets instead a sever punishment, leads also to nervousness and hesitation in the former and courage and confidence in the latter, but, as pointed out above, the different education which they receive, has also very great effect on their mentality.

It is indeed a pity that what Mrs. Annie Besant realised and thought about text-books does not strike the educationists and the political leaders of the country, most of whom, even today, accept as gospel-truth what European historians have written about India. Even gross misrepresentation, whether intentional or unintentional, of ideas, manners, customs and traditions by western writers, has left deep and very often indelible impressions on the Indian mind, with the result that educated Indians fail to appreciate the loftiest and purest idealism underlying Indian culture and the deepest and clearest thinking on which that culture rests. They only look upon it from the wrong angle and with prejudiced vision. The Brahmins, for instance, have almost invariably been represented by European scholars as selfish people, who made and promulgated laws and devised ceremonial rites for others with a view only to benefit themselves, and such representation is taken as correct by Indians, who forget that for their own selves the Brahmins had prescribed only a life of austerity and renunciation. If world affairs were to be conducted under the guidance of people truly inspired by the Brahmanical idealism there could not be all this vice, bitterness, quarrels, and unhappiness.

I have referred to the misrepresentation of Brahmins only by the way, just to show that not only in history but in other subjects also, legal, social, cultural, etc., facts and their significance have been distorted and coloured by unappreciative prejudice. Educated Indians have so much been crushed under the influence of such propagandist education that if one were to tell them anything to the contrary they would at once refer to European scholars and jurists like Maine and others. No wonder that Dr. A. K. Coomarswamy sorrowfully observes, "Speak to the ordinary graduate of an Indian University or a student from Ceylon, he will hasten to display his knowledge of Shakespeare; talk to him of religious philosophy, you will find that he is an atheist of the crude type common in Europe a generation ago, and that not only has he no religion but he is as lacking in philosophy as the average Englishman; talk to him of Indian music he will produce a gramaphone or a harmonium and inflict upon you one or both; talk to him of Indian dress, jewellery, he will tell you that they are uncivilized and barbaric; talk to him about Indian art, it is news to him that such a thing exists; ask him to translate for you a letter written in his own mother tongue, he does not know it. He is indeed a stranger in his own land."

With her children thus become strangers how can India come to her own? How can she get up from her fall and attain her natural height? How can she stand confidently face to face with other countries?

I urge all national leaders to consider that deeply in the quietness of their off-time. Mere vociferous political propaganda will not vitalise the nation so long as the underlying causes of estrangement and denationalisation are not systematically removed by rationalising and giving earnest thoughts to education of children. During the last war the German Kaiser had once said that, if Germany lost the war on account of England's intervention, he would infuse such bitterness in the mind of German children through a suitably devised system of education that when they would grow up they would become deadly enemies of the English. The Kaiser understood the efficacy of education in forming a nation's outlook. But such understanding is still wanting in Indian leaders and educationists, othrwise they would have paid more attention to the curriculum of schools and colleges. With the Congress coming in control of education in so many provinces, it should have devoted its first attention to the matter of revising the school syllabus and reselecting the text-books. It should also have encouraged the writing of true Indian history. While the available history of pre-British period is lacking in valuable information and particulars and abounds in distortions, that of the post-British era is vitiated by suppressed truth and propagandist zeal of writers. Even Indian writers on the latter period have generally either fallen to the temptation of paraphrasing the European historians or have felt nervous (not without reason) to unravel the truth of the country's history, particularly political, economic and industrial. The expositions, for instance, in the Minority Report of the Indian Industrial Commission, no Indian historian could think of referring to in his book. Such defects and handicaps must be removed and Indian boys must be taught the true history of their country. The boys should also be more interested in the physical, economic and political geography of India than of European countries as at present. Greater and more appreciative interest in the classics and literature and in their country's arts and traditions must also be developed in them.

For all that a thoughtful selection of text-books and a judicious replacement of many an undesirable book are very necessary. For that purpose again well informed and very thoughtful people are required to constitute the selection committees. The Congress, the Universities, the different educational institutions and in fact all educationists and thinkers, whatever be their political inclinations, can well collaborate in this vital matter of supreme national importance. As the leading political organisation, let the Congress give a lead, and immediately, by inviting suitable men to serve on a committee to give shape and a push to it.

DIVORCE AND DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

My attention has been drawn to two paragraphs in The Indian Social Reformer of 22nd July which comment on some report of a speech I made at Palamcottah. I am disappointed that even The Indian Social Reformer which I have always believed to maintain a very high standard of accuracy in its statements and fairness in its comments does not seem to have had a correct report of my remarks on the Hindu Women's Right of Divorce Bill, as its comments, which I regret are not quite fair, indicate.

I do not know what The Reformer means by the expression, "violently denounced" the Bill. I am never "violent" nor do I ever "denounce" anything in my speeches even though I may be opposed to it. It is a principle with me never to use strong language and expressions which might be considered violent or bitter and cause misunderstanding or ill-feeling. The subject of my speech in Palamcottah was "Women's Problems." I made a reference to this Bill in the course of my speech as it deals with an important problem relating to women in particular. I repeated the opinion which I have already expressed that I was not in favour of the Bill becoming law in its present form and that this view was held by a very large body of women all over our country. I mentioned among other points that:

This Bill proposes to confer the right of divorce only on women. This is neither fair nor just. Women have always demanded equal rights and status and never claimed any rights which are denied to men. The fact that men are permitted to marry more than one wife is no justification for legislating that only women should have the right of divorce. Suppose a man has scraples about marrying a second wife when his first wife is living and even though it is impossible to live with the latter. Why should he not have the right of divorce when a woman in a similar position has it?

The proposal to demand that women alone should have the right of divorce might cause the wrong impression that modern education introduces western ideas of divorce, etc., among women and thus increases the prejudice against education of girls and also make it harder for women to participate in public life, who are now doing it under serious difficulties and much suspicion. There is also a strong feeling among some of our people that it is not advisable to let our girls grow up with the feeling that women have too many grievances against men and they alone should have certain rights with regard to marriage. They feel that it is dangerous to let their young undeveloped minds imbibe new ideas such as divorce, since they are still being married before they are able to understand fully the responsibilities of marriage. They remark that already instances are increasing where our young girls even with the little modern education they have, are becoming rather difficult wives and daughters-in-law, imagining grievances which really do not exist, and getting discontented and bitter especially where the attractions of fashionable society are strong. Hindu Society should be more advanced with regard to education and age of marriage of girls and monogamy before a law of this kind conferring right of divorce only on women is introduced.

The chief and urgent aim of our women is to prevent polygamy as it is detrimental to domestic peace and happiness and causes much suffering to the discarded wives and their children. Women are anxious to promote a higher and purer standard of life in Indian homes and the idea of divorce is associated more with disruption than with union and happiness. Women are strongly of opinion that it is absolutely necessary not merely in the interests of women but also for the good of society at large to legislate for monogamy before or along with divorce. The mere right of claiming divorce "to women under certain circumstances" does not achieve these objects nor does it help materially in raising the status of women.

This Bill gives no relief to women who are ill-treated or discarded by their husbands but who will not or cannot sue for divorce:—

(a) They might not have facilities for going to Court, especially if they are uneducated and have not friends to help or to advise them or they might not have the financial means to meet the expenses.

(b) They might be too sensitive and shrink from the publicity that divorce gives the parties concerned or their relations might prevent them from taking that step.

(c) They might find themselves in a more difficult position after securing divorce especially if they have no means of livelihood and are unable to stand on their own feet, and they have had no education and training or experience of the world. Remarriage will be an extremely difficult problem particularly if there are children when there still exists in this country a strong prejudice against the remarriage of even young widows.

(d) The fear of separation from her children might prevent a wife from contemplating divorce, however unhappy she be.

(e) The possibility of an unkind or unscrupulous husband bringing forward counter-charges which are absolutely untrue which nevertheless will throw mud on her or which due to his power, influence or wealth he might succeed by unfair methods in proving to be true, will also restrain a wife from contemplating divorce and she will have no other means of redress of grievances.

These are some of the reasons which make one feel that this Bill when it becomes Law, will hardly be any help to women in general. It will concede to women a right merely on paper, which might not be of real benefit in practice and might even cause them harm. It will not prevent polygamy, and other evils, such as having a concubine in the house, which are the main causes of the intense misery and physical and mental suffering that several women are undergoing and of the acute unhappiness in their homes. It will only provide the modern educated woman who marries a man who has a wife living, a defence against the charge that she has done a a wrong to another woman as she will be able to state that the first wife can get a divorce. It is possible that this Bill will therefore be a help to those who are commonly known as 'husband-snatchers' and thereby be a means for causing much injury to good and innocent wives.

Divorce is a difficult problem all the world over and divorce laws have not helped to promote happiness in homes in Western countries where they exist. The present tendency there is to make these laws more strict as the last Divorce Act in England has attempted to do. I agree to a great extent with the view that it is all the more important in India especially at this transitional stage to introduce this legislation only after much deliberation. Legislative measures for social reform should aim to make a proper adjustment between the needs of the day and the prevailing social conceptions. If legislation is hastily introduced, it may fail to make this adjustment and may cause much pain and suffering. The Indian Social Reformer itself has sometimes pointed out the grave consequences of such legislation. The happiness and discipline in homes which are the foundations of Society can only be maintained by the two partners showing equal weight of responsibility and an appreciation of mutual claims, rights and privileges. It is, therefore, necessary that certain restraints should be applied where laxity has caused much harm and vice versa. This, as I said before, is a very difficult task and requires much thought. Above all legislation for social reform should benefit not merely the wealthy and educated classes, who still form only a narrow fringe of our vast population, but also the many millions that live in villages where tradition dies hard and social life is governed by ancient usages, customs and laws which cannot be easily changed.

These briefly, are some of my remarks during my speech to which you refer. Unfortunately your criticisms overlook these points and is based on an incorrect and incomplete report and gives an erroneous and even misleading impression of my speech. I certainly understand that there is no difference between divorce and dissolution of marriage and that as both mean the same thing both might have the same consequences. The difficulties I touched upon in my speech relate not to the general question of divorce or dissolution of marriages but to this particular Bill. Laws for marriage reform should not let married life get more complicated and then provide a solution by severing the bond. It should aim to reduce the causes of disruption to a minimum and to achieve the maximum of happiness.

July 24, 1939. } Yours etc.
K. RADHABAI SUBBAROYAN.

[Our answer to Mrs. Subbaroyan is the following report from the Hindu of July 14, on which our comment was based:

"Mrs. Subbaroyan referred to the problem of divorce and to the Hindu Women's Right to Divorce Bill of Dr. Deshmukh that had now been circulated by the Assembly for eleciting public opinion. Since she was addressing her constituency, she wanted to say what she thought of the Bill. She was definitely not in favour of the Bill. She strongly felt that a bill of this kind, permitting divorce to women when there was no law to enforce monogamy, would do more harm to women than good. This was an instance of hasty social reform legislation, which would result in consequences not now envisaged by the sponsor of the Bill. For one thing, Mrs. Subbaroyan said that the title itself was offensive. It implied that there was something wrong with Hindu women and Hindu society. She believed that what the Hindu women wanted was not the right to divorce, but changes in certain laws that would give them security and happiness. Constituted as the Hindu society was at present, it was very dangerous to plant the idea of divorce into it. Education, she went on to say, instead of elevating some of their women to the true glory of Indian womanhood, had only filled them with wrong ideas of rights and liberties. They could not plant this new germ of divorce among their girls before they had realised the sacred implications of marriage. After referring to the clauses of the Bill, Mrs. Subbaroyan asked what was the use of divorce for a woman who had some children? And then there was the possiblity of the husband making false counter charges, with the result that she might have to lead the rest of her life in infamy, without the ability to meet those charges and prove them to be false. Her home would be wrecked and her hapiness would be blighted. If easy divorce was provided for, pretexts could be found by the second wife, especially if she happened to be an educated woman, who could say that she was a better intellectual companion to her husband. Frankly, she was against the Bill; not that she did not recognise that it might give relief in a few heart-rending cases, but this benefit was nothing compared to the great harm the Bill would cause to the womanhood of India. She hoped sincerely that the Bill would be withdrawn."

The Hindu has a reputation second to none for the accuracy of its reporting. As for her arguments against divorce which Mrs. Subbaroyan accepts as meaning the same as dissolution of marriage, surely then they should apply equally to her own Bill.—Ed., I. S. R.]

MR. BOSE ON PROHIBITION.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose has suggested one method for adoption to make the Prohibition Programme successful from an economic point of view. He suggests that "the foreign liquor consumed by Europeans should be heavily taxed. That could relieve the people from the burden of taxation without hindering the programme of prohibition."

I wonder whether Mr. Subhas Babu has any idea of the European population in Bombay or for the matter of that, in Bombay Presidency. He has put down the loss of revenue at rupees four crores. Is his method likely to fetch to the Bombay Government revenue enough to make up this loss?

A little imagination, if not hard facts and self-evident statistics, would show that the entire revenue can never be made up by merely heavily taxing foreign liquor entirely.

I wish, therefore, that Mr. Bose may not advocate methods which cannot stand even an ordinary test. He may, if he chooses, run down the Bombay Ministry and its Prohibition Programme, but let his arguments and the methods proposed by him, be such as to appeal to all intelligent people.

ARYAS IN HYDERABAD.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Bombay.

Sir,

I have read with great interest the letter by Mr. Ram Prasad under the caption "The Aryas in Hyderabad" which appeared in your issue of 15th July and your caustic editorial comment there on. Regard for relevancy or for truth has never been a strong point with the Aryan publicists. They avail of any opportunity they can get to indulge in their irresponsible diatribes against the Nizam and his Government. The Satyagraha, as you have rightly analysed it is, "nothing but organised hooliganism." I have no interest in the question of propriety or otherwise of the Provincial Governments placing restrictions on the hate-breeding activities of the Arya Satygraha promoters, though I entirely agree with the considered opinion expressed in your leader of the 1st July on the matter. The incongruity of Congress Goverments is one beyond ordinary comprehension. I should like, however, to make a few comments on Mr. Ram Prasad's letter.

He avers that the Arya Samaj Satyagraha was not started in a "spirit of light-heartedness." I agree, because it was undoubtedly started in a spirit of wicked heartedness. The talk of constitutional representations spread over six years to arrive at an amicable settlement is all eyewash. Every time representations were made they were in a dictatorial and threatening spirit which no Government worthy of its name would tolerate. Legitimate grievances were investigated and remedied from time to time by the Government but nothing could be done in regard to numerous allegations which on investigation were proved false. For example only in the solitary instance of an Arya temple in Kalyani was the flying of the Ohm flag prohibited by some officer. The action of the local officials was disapproved by the Government and departmental action taken. The Ohm flag has not been prohibited and is not now prohibited yet Ram Prasad makes one believe that home flags have been forcibly removed. They can today be seen flying everywhere. At the request of Mr. Ghanashyam Gupta who desired that the enquiries should be conducted in some matters by Mr. Hollins, Director General of Police, Sir Akbar Hydari ordered enquiry into the allegations. Mr. Hollins investigated the charges and found them false but this did not satisfy the Arya propagandists, out to create trouble, who at once started mud-slining at Mr. Hollins and stated that his findings were biassed. Against such irresponsible behaviour there is no constitutional remedy.

Mr. Ram Prasad on your incontrovertible asertion that, "if 150 Arya samajes were allowed to exist and carry on their usual functions they could not be suffering from any serious restrictions on religious propaganda," states that "the Arya Samajes are not of one day's making, but the restrictions are recent and galling." If census statistics are correct, three decades ago the Arya Samajists barely existed in Hyderabad and there was only one Arya Mandir. Today there are 45 for a small population returned at the last census as 3,700. The restrictions under reference relating to the permission for erecting new temples and repairing old ones were issued some 40 years ago when the general rule was laid down, to prevent any breach of the public peace, that any religious building (such as mosque, church and other place of worship) should not be constructed without previous permission. It is clear that this is no recent attack on Arya religious freedom.

The insinuation that the Arya Samajists are groaning under oppression of a prejudiced Ecclesiastical Department is false. Such regulations as are existing in Hyderabad are common to all religions and are framed on the principle of safeguarding public tranquility, without discrimination. As stated in a recent communique by Government it has yet to learn that any application for opening of an Arya Samaj Mandir has ever been refused by it. Over 150 Hindu temples were constructed, mostly with Government aid, in the past ten years.

Mr. Ram Prasad refers to Arya Samaj preachers being prohibited entry in the State. This was due to the fact that records showed that a number of them were making statements offensive to other communities, and this restriction was only a temporary measure applied to all communities owing to the existing communal tension. Mr. Prasad refers to Pandit Ram Chandar of Delhi who was externed from the State in 1933. His externment was based on a lecture delivered at Halikhed which was found to be objectionable and offensive to another community.

THE KING IN THE U. S. A.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your (issue of June 17th) remarks on the Royal visit to the United States, will give an impression very unfair to the U. S. A. people. And especially to the President's wife, who is credited by implication, with feeling a satisfaction that she had an opportunity of showing slights to their Majesties—as, "The President's wife has stated in her syndicated articles that she left the entertaining of the King and Queen to the household staff at White House, and she even narrates with evident enjoyment one or two minor mishaps which attended the service at dinner and tea at her mother-in-law's." There is a Press in America, as in all countries, which makes its capital out of ill nature and calumny, and it is a pity that its vapourings should be thought worthy of reproduction, and even more regrettable that the visit of our King and Queen to the United State, in its aspect of a first class Historic Event, from which a vast amount of good will emanate, is not noticed at all.

It is pleasant to turn to the American Ambassador's speech at the Independence Day Dinner at the American Society in London, July, 4th, at which he said his correspondents were unanimous in their praise of the King and Queen; there was not one dissenting voice. One letter was from a blunt New York business man, a man who was not given to tossing his hat in the air for anybody or anything. It was so typical that he would like to read a few sentences from it:

"There is only one topic of conversation round here nowadays, and it's not the weather, although that's been hot enough to call for many fervent adjectives. Washington certainly threw a great party. The King and Queen stood it well, but scores of Americans broke down before it was half over. Of course the King and Queen had a big advantage in such ordeals, they had had a month's training. Nonetheless when a man and wife can change their clothes five times in one day—in a city as hot as Washington was—and still keep smiling, it's indisputable proof of character and stamina..... Yes! It's a cinch that the King and Queen have made more friends for England in America than ever anybody else ever made in the history of the two nations. They've been gracious, patient, and lovely, all through it. I doubt if there are two other people on the face of the earth who would undergo it calmly and smilingly, never once sending out a call for help, or threatening to resign if the punishment continued. I guess though that the King and Queen would have begged America for "appeasement" if they'd been here another day. Goodwill as we understand it, seems to be something akin to football, it's not properly expressed if the guests are still conscious at the finish. Anyhow in our blunt way we tried to show 'em that we liked 'em. We sure do."—(Times, July 5th.)

Cambridge.
July, 8th, 1939. } Yours faithfully,
I. J. PITT.

[We do not understand what is meant by saying the visit was a great success. Of course, there were large crowds to see the royal procession. So for as the relations between Britain and the U. S. A. go, the King's visit has not certainly improved them. We still think that their Majesties made themselves cheap for nothing.—Ed., I.S.R.]

Sir,

I presume that several replies would be published in the Spectator in answer to Mr. Joad's article. If there is any reply from an eminent scholar like Dean Inge, I hope that it would be republished by you for the information of your readers.

Possibly there might be letters to you from eminent theologians in India; but I hope that space could be found for my letter also, although I am not a theologian.

I may say at once that all thoughtful persons, who are not committed to any particular creed, do find that some of the sayings and some of the acts of Jesus, if they have been reported correctly, are difficult to understand. Mr. Joad has mentioned a few; but there are others also such as the barren fig tree and the Gadarene Swine incidents, the agony in Gethsamane, the triumphal procession, etc.

The points which I wish to make, however, are somewhat different and are given below.

(1) It is impossible for any person, however scholarly, to understand the sayings and doings of any great mystic and psychic, unless the scholar himself has some mystic or psychic gifts. From Mr. Joad's writings, it is clear that he is not a mystic or a psychic, and perhaps he does not even believe in any such gift. The utmost scholarly attainments cannot of themselves supply this gift.

(2) Mr. Joad apparently does not distinguish between words as used by a rationalist philosopher or a grammarian, and words used by a person who wishes to say things that should be remembered. The meaning of Jesus's words about hating the father, etc., could easily be understood, for instance, by any follower of Gandhiji, who goes into jail or fasts against the wishes of his father and the tears of his mother. 'Hate' manifestly does not possess its literal meaning.

(3) Similarly, several difficulties of Mr. Joad seem to be resolvable on the assumption that Jesus frequently spoke of the God within and Himself as the same. This is because He knew or felt that His was as the perfect or right-angle-relationship to God. There are several approximations to the right angle, but only one possible right angle. Mr. Joad's difficulties about bribe and blackmail are probably understandable on this basis.

(4) Mr. Joad's assertion that the life of Jesus does not entirely support His gospel of love, seems to be due entirely to lack of sympathetic understanding.

I trust that Indians who usually possess intuition will not endorse this view. There are still various difficulties left over, for instance, eternal fire, seeming over-sensitiveness, etc., but I wish to say here that Hindus in Travancore seem to feel no difficulties; and many of them who are not professing Christians, have written with complete faith in the divinity of Christ. This was a revelation to me after I came to reside in this place a few years ago. I do not believe that the same is true to the same extent elsewhere. I have witnessed a drama on the life of Jesus composed by a Hindu and put on the stage by Hindus. There are poems on Mary Magdalene and on other Gospel stories which are composed by the most eminent Malayalam scholars. There is such a poetry text-book in which the great majority of poems are the composition of Hindus. None of them seems to feel difficulties about Jesus. In all lectures Hindus use the expression "Sree Yesu Bhagavan." I recollect a couple of lines in one of the well known poems which means "He who, by a wink of His eyes could create or destroy worlds....." The poet was contrasting this with the crown of thorns. There are many similar passages.

I am glad to testify that what you say about the relationship between Hindus and Moslems in British India is equally true in Travancore concerning Hindus and Christians, in spite of the politicians. Even the politicians are friendly socially.

Kottayyam, July 11, 1939. } Yours etc. K. CHANDY.

LORD SINHA'S PEERAGE.

The Lord Chancellor, announcing the decision of the Lords Committee of Privileges on Lord Sinha's application for a writ of summons, said: "I have formed the opinion, in which I believe your Lordships concur, that the petitioner, on the facts stated, has established that he is 'the heir male of the body of the late Lord Sinha, lawfully begotten.'"

The Lord Chancellor said:

The petitioner was beyond doubt the eldest son of the late Lord Sinha by his only wife, and equally beyond doubt he was lawfully begotten according to the laws in India applicable to Hindu parents. Having regard to the domicile of the parties at marriage at the date when it was solemnised, the marriage would be properly treated as valid in this country for all purposes, except perhaps inheritage of real estate before the Law of Property Act, 1925, or devolution of entailed interests as equitable interests before or since that date and some other exceptional cases.

The Lord Chancellor proceeded: The present question related to the descent of dignity conferred by the Crown on a subject resident and domiciled in India, who, according to his religion at the date of the patent, was prohibited from forming a polygamous union. The case was without precedent in the Peerage Law, and in the absence of authority must be decided in the light of its special facts.

The Lord Chancellor said that the petition was presented to the King in December 1936, and was referred to the House of Peers. The Attorney General, having reported to the King that he was then in doubt whether the evidence produced to him, if accepted, would establish a marriage entitling the petitioner to make pedigree and establish his descent in the Peerage Law from the first Lord Sinha, "there was now no dispute in relation to any of the facts stated in the petition."

The late Baron Sinha, on May 15, 1880, married Gobinda Mohini Sinha, according to the formalities prescribed by Hindu Law and usage. He and his wife were at all times domiciled in the Presidency of Bengal, and were members of the Hindu community at the date of the marriage, which took place in the Presidency. Hindu Law did not forbid plurality of wives, but the marriage in fact remained a unit between the late Lord Sinha and his wife to the exclusion of any other spouses. It was a monogamous marriage.

The Lord Chancellor proceeded that in 19 before the birth of the petitioner, the Sinhas joined the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj of which they remained members throughout their whole married life. One of the tenets of the sect was monogamy, and Indian courts would not recognise the validity of a second marriage while he continued to be a member of the sect and the first wife was alive. The petitioner was born in Calcutta on August 22, 1887, and was the eldest son of the marriage. The question was whether the petitioner, within the meaning of the Patent, was heir male of the body of the late Lord Sinha, lawfully begotten.

The Lord Chancellor said that nothing in their decision of the petition was intended to apply to a case where the petitioner was claiming as the son of a parent who had in fact married two wives. It was apparent that great difficulties might arise in questions relating to descent of dignity where marriage from which heirship was alleged to result, was of a polygamous character. If sons were born to more than one of the wives, it might be difficult to reconcile one of these sons with English ideas of "heirship" which must be involved in the words contained in the Patent granted by the King in the well-known form and dealing with British dignity, which entitled the holder to sit and vote in the House of Lords.

The Lord Chancellor said that if there were several wives the son of the second or third wife might claim the dignity to the exclusion of a later born son of the first wife. Our law as regards heirship had provided no means of settling such questions as these. These difficulties, however, did not arise in the present case.

The decision of the Committee will be reported to House.—Reuter.

HINDU MAHASABHA AND HYDERABAD

"I welcome the announcement of the Reforms by the Nizam's Government as a wise move betokening on their part change of heart for the better," says Mr. V. D. Savarkar, President of the Hindu Mahasabha in the course of a statement on the Hyderabad reforms.

Mr. Savarkar adds in spite of the fact that the reforms assume that Muslims, though forming 10 per cent minority, are to be politically recognised on equal basis with Hindus and reserve 50 per cent seats in the Legislature for Muslims as Muslims, he still feels no hesitation in saying that even these reforms "halting as they are," do constitute a substantial advance over the old order of things and open out a constitutional channel which, if the Nizam Government would only help the Hindus in all sincerity to work out, may lead to future expansion and fuller freedom.

Mr. Savarkar reciprocates the hope expressed by the Nizam in a "spirit of accomodation and response" for which he pleads.

To review and reconsider the attitude of the Hindu Mahasabha in future towards this question Mr. Savarkar says he has called a meeting of the Mahasabha as well as a meeting of the All India Nizam Civil Resistance Committee on July 31 at Poona.

Mr. Savarkar concludes that the announcement of reforms is bound to relieve to a great extent keen tension and if only the Nizam's Government orders immediately graceful release of all civil resisters of the Hindu Sabha and Arya Samaj before the meeting at Poona, such chivalrous act on the part of the Nizam cannot fail to restore peaceful and friendly atmosphere.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

NOTES.

Temple Entry by Harijans :—On the 4th July the trustees of the Minakshi Temple at Madura, one of the three or four great shrines of the Tamil country, admitted a party of the scheduled castes hitherto excluded from Hindu temples, headed by some workers in the Harijan movement. A few months back the Government of Madras introduced in the Legislature a measure for enabling trustees of temples in Malabar to admit Harijans if the worshippers by a majority accorded their sanction. The Prime Minister explained that the Bill was limited to Malabar as it adjoined Travancore where three years ago the Maharaja had thrown open state temples to Harijans and Hindu opinion may be expected to be prepared for the reform. The admission of Harijans to the Madura temple which is in the heart of the Tamil country, therefore, was unexpected. The orthodox section of the Hindus of Madura promptly instituted proceedings in the local courts against the trustees for breach of old custom and applied for an injunction against their repeating their offence. The Madras Government promptly published an indemnity Bill to save the trustees and others concerned and, as the Legislature is not in session, had it promulgated as a Governor's Ordinance on Monday. The Ordinance-making power of the Governor-General and Governors was opposed on constitutional grounds by the Indian public when they were employed to put down the Civil Disobedience movement. Their use for the purpose of stopping pending litigation in a matter involving neither the peace nor the safety of the State, and that by and on the advice of a Congress Government, is, to say the least, surprising. Soon after the incident at the Madura temple another temple in a village some miles away from Madura was reported to have admitted Harijans. The hereditary Trustee of the Tanjore devastanam temples, numbering some ninety, has declared his intention to throw open these temples to Harijan. They were admitted to one of these, the famous Tanjore Big Temple on the 16th. The Trustee is a scion of the royal family of Tanjore which was one of the States annexed by Lord Dalhousie. The commotion caused by these events has led to temples in places visited by Mrs. Brijlal Nehru, President of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, who is now touring the Tamil country, being locked up by the persons in charge during Mrs. Nehru's visit. There is no doubt an awakening in this matter in Tamil land. A number of Tamil saints have for centuries inveighed against the rigours of caste. Some of them have been canonised like Nanda the Pariah whose image is to be seen right in the middle of the sixty-three Saiva saints enshrined in one of the galleries of the Chidambaram temple famous for its image of Nataraja. Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar speaking at a public meeting in Madras welcomed this movement, especially, he said, as the Harijans of the Tamil country were devout people with real faith in Hinduism. The suddenness of the events seems to have alarmed some Congress leaders. Dr. Pattabhi Sitarammaya, Chairman of the Andhra Congress Committee and also a member of the Working Committee of the Indian National Congress, and the Chairman of the Tamil Nad Congress Committee, have jointly issued a statement deprecating the extension of the movement to temples in other places before the excitement of the Madura incident has had time to cool down.

What is Discipline?—Our Congress (Rightist) friends have out of date notions of soldiers' discipline. In the days when soldiers were recruited by means of press gangs mostly from the riff-raff of society, illiterate, ignorant, criminally disposed, discipline had to be maintained by brutal methods. Blind unquestioning obedience was exacted from them, any deviation from orders was punished with flogging. In fact, the soldier's life under this dispensation was not different from that of a slave or prisoner undergoing penal servitude. The phrase 'soldier's discipline' has long ceased to have this meaning. The discipline in modern citizen armies is altogether different. One of the first British officers entrusted with the duties of registering recruits for the Militia, Major R. T.

Reynolds, describing his experiences in the Spectator mentions incidentally: "It is laid down that the man should understand what he is doing and why he is doing it." In the same article he tells of a lad who begged to be posted somewhere "where he would not be asked to stick a bayonet into anybody." Conscientious objectors are now recognised and given exemption from bearing arms in civilised countries. But they have to belong to certain religious sects which hold the creed of non-violence. A New Zealander who did not belong to any such sect but had conscientious objections to associate himself with any kind of army work, even to the wearing of a uniform, on humanitarian grounds, tells the story of his experiences in a book, "We Will Not Cease," described on the dust-cover as the autobiography of a conscientious objector. If anyone wants to know how the principle of non-resistance works in practice and not merely in talk, he should read this book.

Government House and Prohibition:—By declaring that all public entertaining at Government House will be dry, the Governor of Bombay has taken up an attitude which is scrupulously correct. Official entertaining will be dry; private entertaining at which guests not eligible for permits are present, will be dry as well, as, in the words of His Excellency, "I shall prefer to make no distinction among my guests." It would in any case have been extremely difficult to make a distinction between permit-holders and those who are not eligible for permits, even at private parties. Even at the exclusive parties of eligibles at which liquor will be served, there will be many difficulties. Is eligibility for a permit to be the criterion or must it be the actual holding of a permit which will admit one to these exclusive parties? Every addict who has a medical certificate is an eligible until his application for a permit is rejected by the Commissioner. In the same way, every European is eligible until and unless the Commissioner decides that he has an Indian domicile or will settle permanently in India. This problem can be solved by restricting admission to the exclusive parties to members of the European Association after it has been purged of its Domiciled members. On the other hand, a European who is eligible may not have exercised his privilege of getting a permit. As the inclusion of one non-eligible by mistake will change the party into a mixed one, the greatest care will have to be exercised to restrict admission ultimately not to the eligibles but to actual permit-holders, who will be required carry their permits along with them for inspection. We had expected a more definite lead from Government House. What His Excellency has announced is no more than a declaration to abide by the law of the province. Less than this he could not, as the head of the Government, have done.

Europeans, Foreign and Domiciled:—Mr. Marklew whose forefather settled in India two centuries ago has in a letter to the President of the Calcutta European Association from which he resigned recently, intimated his intention to start a separate Association of Domiciled Europeans. Sir Henry Gidney who is President of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European Association has intervened in the controversy and rebuked Mr. Marklew for thinking that he has any interests different from the Anglo-Indian. Sir Henry Gidney is wrong. Domiciled Europeans, that is to say, Europeans who have made their homes in India, are as a rule, considerable contributors to the material advancement of the country. They exercise a good influence on their surroundings, they interest themselves in their surroundings, often take a leading part in the civic life and are generally held in respect by all communities. They are not supercilious towards their fellow Indians and in several cases they have sought to help the latter in advancing common interests. In a word they are an asset not a liability. We should like to see a large number of retired civilians and other officers settle down in India and give the country the benefit of their experience of administration which is now totally lost by their retirement to England.

South African Indians and the Mother Country:—Indian Views published in Durban calls attention to the small number of South African Indians who sought repatriation last year. According to the Report of the Commissioner of Immigration and Asiatic Affairs, the number was about two hundred, and of these most were Indian-born. Indian Views comments thereon thus:

> The South African born Indian feels that he is a South African. South Africa is the only country he knows; its customs and conditions are to him the very tang of his home. If instead of prejudicing these people, the Europeans in this country were to advance the hand of friendship and co-operation, our talents and all that we have would be contributed lavishly to the advancement of this country. But if we are made to feel that we are aliens then there is nothing for us to do but to try to get all we can out of the land and contribute nothing in return.

Under the Cape Town Agreement, it was agreed that South African Indians should adopt the western standard of life. Only superficial observers will take the western standard to mean no more than eating and drinking, wearing trousers and hats. There is an inner core of spirituality in the western as in eastern ideas of a good life. Broadly speaking, it is the same in both. In people who have absorbed the spiritual significance of civilisation, the question of food, drink and clothes is of secondary importance. They will, if only not to mark themselves out as distinct from their fellows, adopt in their outer everyday life the modes and customs prevalent in the country of their domicile. But they will be more intent on making themselves serviceable to the land they live in, by setting a high example in their personal lives. Even if this does not find immediate response it is sure to tell in the long run.

Colour Bar in U. S. A.:—We call attention to the extracts which we publish elsewhere from a letter of the Washington correspondent of the Madras Mail. He reports that New York State has passed drastic legislation against discrimination on the ground of race, colour or religion by hotels and places of public resort under severe penalties. This is a very important step in social legislation in the States. We are surprised that it did not strike Reuter's Agency as being worthy of inclusion in its daily budget of news to this country. The Madras Mail correspondent goes on to say that this beneficent measure of reform has been brought about not by agitation on the part of American Negroes but by their quiet persistence in improving their cultural standard, which has made it impossible for the colour bar to be maintained in a community so educated and progressive as New York. Six years ago not even the porters in New York hotels were Negroes as they often were in Chicago. Today no New York Hotel can deny admission to a Negro guest at the risk of heavy fines and even imprisonment. That is about the best piece of news that has come from America for some years.

Communalism:—With the introduction of provincial autonomy, the communal issue has become acute. Not separate electorates but weightages accorded to minorities in certain provinces have proved to be the aggravating factor. Mr. H. L. Mehta of Lahore in his article which we printed last week, argues at length on the sufferings of the Hindu minority in the Punjab as contrasted with the position of Muslim minorities in the Congress Provinces. On the other hand, Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, the Punjab Premier, has of late done publicity work for himself by holding up his treatment of minorities as an example to Congress ministries, and the Muslim League talks of "atrocities" against Muslim minorities in Congress provinces. It is obvious, however, that it would be impossible to satisfy the Muslim League in Congress provinces or Hindu politicians in Muslim provinces without violating every principle of administration and injuring not only the majority and lesser minority communities but the interests of the provinces as a whole. We do not see why the acid test of a good administration should be the number of appointments which fall to the principal minority community. Why should a civil engineer, a doctor or a teacher be regarded as more fitted for a post in a secular Government because he happened to be born—for a continuing faith is not required—in a particular community? Nobody pretends that a Hindu or a Muslim appointed to satisfy quota requirements, is chosen because he is a Hindu or a good Muslim. Everybody suspects that he is a bad engineer, a bad doctor or an indifferent teacher.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, July 22, 1939.

HYDERABAD CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS.

The Committee appointed two years ago by the Nizam's Government to make recommendations for necessary and suitable constitutional reforms, made its report in August last year. This along with the amendments suggested by the Council of Ministers and His Exalted Highness' final orders thereon, were issued to the Press this week. The principal recommendations of the Committee fall under several heads: the improvement of methods of recruitment for the Public Services so as to obviate nepotism; the extension of civil liberties; the appointment of a Commission to investigate religious grievances; the expansion of the present Legislative Council; the creation of statutory Advisory Committees to assist Ministers in charge of nation-building departments; the reconstitution of local self-government institutions; the establishment of Panchayats; and the holding of annual conferences in all the districts to ascertain the needs and desires of the people. The central feature of the Committee's recommendations which will attract most attention is the expansion of the Legislative Council. Other States which have adopted constitutional reforms, have followed on the lines of British India and formed electorates on the basis of population, property and education. They have moved on the lines of parliamentary democracy with adult suffrage as the ultimate aim. The States have not followed British India in adopting communal electorates, relying on nominations to redress inadequate representation of any section or group of the population.

The Hyderabad scheme has adopted a line of its own. It makes economic interests the basis of its electorates. The Aiyangar Committee frankly admits that it has borrowed this feature from the Corporative State. "The Corporative State" is associated in the public mind with Fascism. On that account alone Hyderabad will start with a heavy weight of prejudice against the Committee's scheme. But except for the adoption of "economic interests" as the basis of its electoral system, the Committee follows the main lines of parliamentary democracy. In the Corporative State only members of the Fascist party are eligible to be voters or candidates. There is no equivalent of the Fascist party in Hyderabad at present and there is no obligation on the part of voters and candidates to subscribe to any particular political creed. Again, all initiative, whether in legislation or in administration, in the Corporative State is in the hands of the Party Executive. In the Hyderabad scheme the initiative in several subjects is left with the members of the Legislature, of whom nearly one-half will be elected by the "interests." The Hyderabad scheme may, therefore, be said to be a combination of the corporative and the parliamentary democratic ideas. The weight of political opinion at present in the democratic as well as Fascist countries, is that the two are like oil and water and cannot mix. The Hyderabad experiment has thus an interest to students of politics.

Though the "economic interests" are meant to divert the elector's mind from communal to economic ends, it does not altogether succeed in doing this. And no wonder. Communities represent the bed-rock of Indian life. Communal instincts rests in the minds of millions override economic interests. The villager, Hindu, Muslim or Christian, will spend several years' earnings on a communal function without a thought of the hardship which the extravagance will entail on him for perhaps the rest of his life-time. He lives, thinks and acts in terms of communal life. The communal interest in fact is the only interest he cares for. Though the Hyderabad scheme is based on "economic interests" it will, we are sure, be transformed in the communal consciousness of the masses into communal ones. His Exalted Highness's firman itself bears evidence of this inescapable tendency. "I agree," says His Exalted Highness, "with the proposals made by my Executive Council as regards the representation of the Muslims and of the different communities in the Assembly." His Exalted Highness's object in referring specifically to the representation provided for his Muslim subjects was, no doubt, to remove the apprehensions that may be entertained by them as regards their future under the reformed regime. Nevertheless one can not but feel that the sentence is not very congruous in a royal decree promulgating a new constitution for the better government of the State and the greater happiness of all its subjects. The general complaint now is that the Hindu population is not having equal opportunities with the Muslim minority in the political and administrative spheres. The success of the scheme will to a large extent depend on its effectiveness in removing legitimate causes for this complaint. In this connection, the Committee's recommendation for the appointment of a Commission to investigate communal grievances, seems to be preferable to the Government's suggestion of a permanent Commission for the purpose. A permanent commission need be instituted only to deal with perennial problems. The communal grievances now existing or alleged, it may be hoped, will be redressed and measures adopted to prevent their recurrence. A permanent Committee having no work to do will, like individuals and institutions which have outlived their usefulness, be driven by the instinct of self-preservation to foment new differences to make work for itself.

The Reformer has all along maintained that communalism in itself is not the unmitigated evil that it is generally thought to be. The people of India are a nation of communities. From early times Indian policy has been to leave each community to live its own independent, separate and distinctive life. Though there was no intermarriage and interdining, there has nevertheless subsisted a good deal of neighbourly feeling and good fellowship among the communities. This is the case even today in the countryside where political propaganda has not yet penetrated. Scores and hundreds of instances can be cited of intimate friendship between Hindus and Muslims and Parsis. Every one who knows something of Indian social life can easily find many instances in his own experience. We repeat, therefore, that the existence of different communities among us, is not necessarily an evil. In any case, it is part of India's ineradicable heritage. The British Government for nearly a hundred years tried to rule India without recognising the existence of communities. They had to give it up thirty years ago when they introduced the first stages of representative government. It is possible that there were political motives. But motives are the media through which historical forces seek to fulfil themselves. The Indian National Congress after a few years of protest accepted the situation and adopted its own Pact which formed the basis of the electorates under the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms. Since then the leaders of the Congress have tried concession after concession to secure what is called Hindu-Muslim unity, meaning thereby no more than joint electorates, and have not yet given up trying.

The arguments used by the Aiyangar Committee to show that "economic interests" are the means by which communal differences can be reconciled, are far-fetched and unconvincing. We can not indeed help thinking that the members were themselves only half convinced of the efficacy of their prescription. They have carefully avoided even mentioning the terms "Hindu" and "Muslim" in their report. The reader unacquainted with Hyderabad would conclude that these terms do not have any significance in Hyderabad politics while in actual fact they underlie the most urgent problems confronting Hyderabad statesmanship. There is a superstition, wrote Bacon, in avoiding superstition. There is a communalism in avoiding communalism. Communal quarrels are, to our mind, preferable to economic class wars. We are unable to think that substituting economic classes or interests will lead to any more harmony in the country than communal differences. So long as it is not possible to do without distinction in electorates, it is better to retain the familiar communal to the novel one of interests. The bitterness in British Indian politics is not due to communal electorates and will not cease with their abolition. It is due to preferences in the shape of weightages given to one or some sections of the electors as against and at the expense of others. A privileged class is an anachronism in a modern State whether corporative, democratic or bureaucratic. Democracy, Communism, Fascism, Nazism are one on this point. The requirements of a common citizenship and the existence of different communities in the population, constitute a difficult problem. We have a solution which we should like to see tried. Hyderabad offers a favourable field for its trial. It is a large enough State to have a two-chamber legislature. The single chamber proposed in the Reforms scheme is a defect. Even in a small country like Eire, Mr. De Valera who had intended to do without a second chamber, finally found it necessary to retain it. A lower house elected on the population basis and an upper house with equal representation for every community irrespective of size, on the model of the American Senate to which each of the States, large and small, sends two representatives, holds, we think, the promise of a fairly satisfactory arrangement in the conditions of Hyderabad.

PROHIBITION RULES.

The Government of Bombay published last week detailed rules for the application of their Prohibition policy. There is one rule among them which is altogether unexpected and which constitutes a radical change in the policy as outlined in previous official pronouncements. It provides that "a permit for the use or consumption of foreign liquor may be granted to any person who is not a minor, if the Commissioner or such Excise officer as may be authorised by him in this behalf, is satisfied that such person shall (will) be seriously and permanently affected, if such person is not permitted to use or consume such liquor." This is not a permit for the medical use of alcohol which is covered by a separate clause and which applies to minors as well as to adults. Nor is this intended only for addicts, old and infirm persons who cannot change the habits of a life-time. The rule as it stands extends the right to secure a permit to any one who is not a minor and who can satisfy the Commissioner that his health will suffer if he is obliged to abstain from drinking. Even a man who has been a total abstainer as a minor is not excluded from eligibility for a permit. The authority to be satisfied under the rule quoted above is the Commissioner or other officer authorised by the Commissioner, who will ordinarily be a non-medical person. Government state that they will issue further orders regarding the manner in which this and other rules are to be given effect to. For the present it appears that if any person, Hindu, Muslim or Parsi, goes to the Commissioner or his deputy and represents that, unless he is allowed the use of foreign liquor, his health will seriously and permanently suffer, the officer will have to give him the permit. If the Commissioner or other official is himself habituated to the use of liquor and feels uncomfortable without it, he will be naturally inclined to sympathise with the applicant and would shrink from taking the responsibility of refusing him a permit. Unless Government have made a rule departmentally that no one who is not himself a total abstainer will be employed to enforce total abstinence on others, this extension of the circle of persons eligible to get permits, will practically operate as a general concession to all who care to take the trouble of waiting on the Commissioner with woe-begone faces and a petition for a permit supported by a medical certificate. In view of the many difficulties internal and external, with which they are faced and with which we deal in another article, Government probably had no option but to relax their original intentions. The new rule must satisfy the Parsis who objected to the distinction made between Asiatics and non-Asiatics. The distinction now is between adults who feel that their health will be affected and those who do not feel so. If a man—and still more if a woman—feels that his or her health will be affected without a daily dose of liquor, it will be rash for a Commissioner to say that it will not be affected, with the possibility of legal proceedings if from any cause the person refused a permit, happens to fall ill at any time thereafter. It is also difficult to distinguish what is serious illness and what is only a passing ailment. In our experience what doctors diagnosed as a simple fever has turned out to be typhoid or tuberculosis. In other cases where the doctors took a serious view, patients have got cured without much medicating. In one of the largest hospitals in the United States, post-mortem examination showed that 60 per cent of the cases were wrongly diagnosed and treated for diseases other than those from which the deceased were actually suffering. If this is the case with doctors' diagnoses, a lay officer like the Commissioner of Excise would be taking a heavy responsibility on himself if he decided that an applicant for a permit will not suffer seriously and permanently in health, when the man himself avers he will, if not allowed to drink the desired liquor. The force of auto-suggestion is now recognised and a man can make himself seriously ill by constantly thinking that he will be so. The Commissioner should be a psycho-therapist in order to avert the catastrophe. This rule certainly marks a fundamental departure from the ground on which alone Prohibition can be justified, namely, that abstinence from drink ensures better health than non-abstinence and that no one suffers injury to health, serious or slight, permanent or temporay, by abstaining from drink.

Two other classes are allowed permits under the Bombay Prohibition rules. To the first belong a sovereign of a foreign State, a ruler of an Indian State, an ambassador, a diplomatic envoy, a consul of a foreign State and their wives, who will be granted free a permit for the use of foreign liquor, presumably without any restrictions as to quantity. Foreigners—the proposal to restrict the concession to Europeans has been given up—will be eligible for permits on proving that the person applying was born and brought up or domiciled in any country outside India where such liquor is being generally consumed and that he is only residing temporarily in India with a "fixed settled purpose of making his sole and permanent home in any country outside India." This clause is loosely constructed. Generally an applicant will have to convince the Commissioner that he proposes to settle permanently not "in any country outside India" but in that country in which he was born and brought up or domiciled. The Commissioner's office will have a hard time examining the birth certificates, school certificates, domicile papers, etc., to decide whether applicants are eligible for foreigners' permits. More than office will have to consider the possibilities of those who announce their intention of settling abroad permanently, being able to realise their ambition. For we presume that the "fixed settled purpose" relates to an economically realisable ambition rather than an abstract wish. Whether for reasons of health or nationality, all eligibles are entitled to the same quantity of liquor in the month. A permit-holder is entitled to have in his possession a monthly quota of seven units. A unit, according to the rules, shall consist of "one quart bottle of 23 ounces of spirits of liquor, or three quart bottles of wine or vermouth, or nine bottles of foreign fermented foreign liquor, or a combination of smaller quantities of the above in proportion, e.g., one-third bottle of whisky, one bottle of champagne, and three bottles of beer." This generous concession to Europeans is understandable if one realises the fact that Europeans were from the very beginning regarded as outside the Bombay Government's Prohibition law. But for the dangers of Europeans making a business of selling liquor illegally to the non-permitted, each applicant might well have been asked to state his needs which could have been fully satisfied. But it is amazing that the addict-eligible is also allowed the same number of units. We should have thought that the same authority which certifies an applicant's dependance on alcohol, would have been asked to specify the amount of alcohol necessary as well. All that one can infer from the Bombay Government's rules is that nobody will require for the maintenance of his health more than seven permit units. Even the Bombay Government does see some limit to the health value of alcoholic drinks.

SOUTH AFRICA AND THE LEAGUE COUNCIL.

A message was published a few days ago that the South African Union had intimated to the General Secretary of the League of Nations her intention to put up a candidate for a vacant seat in the League Council. We took it to be a mild propaganda intended to show the world that the League is not dead nor dying but sufficiently strong to make membership of her Council an object of aspiration to a prosperous State like South Africa. As General Smuts is one of the reputed parents of the League, this way of giving it a leg-up might have been an inspiration of that soldier-statesman-philosopher-opportunist. He might have also intended it as a subtle hint to the British Cabinet, the other Dominions and the world at large, that the South African Union does not approve of the attempts to form a Peace Front in Europe outside the League of Nations and in derogation of it. However that may be, the idea that India should, by way of retaliation for the adverse discrimination shown against Indians in South Africa, oppose the latter's candidature, is based on a narrow and short-sighted view. We are not concerned here with the probability of Indian opposition finding sufficient support to throw out South Africa or with the competence of the Indian delegate to vote independently of the British delegation. We have in view only the efficacy of the "retaliation" method as a means of improving the position of South African Indians, assuming that it is successful in keeping South Africa out of the Council. It must be obvious that the feelings of the South African Europeans will be embittered by such a result. That would not increase the chances of the Indian case getting a more favourable hearing from Government which will naturally regard such opposition on an international platform as an open declaration of hostility to the Union. South African Indians declare that they are an integral part of the Union population and claim to be treated as equals with the rest under the Cape Town Agreement. Opposition of India to South Africa's candidature, will be a virtual relinquishment of this claim. After that, there can be no parleying between the two countries about the treatment of Indians in the Union. The question must be approached from a different standpoint. The South African Whites are, like others of the Dominions Whites, at present extremely self-centred. They have no vision beyond their own particular interests and whatever seems to be against those interests, is sought to be suppressed by force without regard to consequences. The cure for this type of mind is to be placed in contact with world problems which are ever so much more complicated and more far-reaching in their ramifications than the problems of any single country, much more than those of South Africa which, whatever it may think of itself, is still a nation in the making. As a member of the governing Council of a League which, in name at least, is one of all nations without regard to differences of colour or race, South Africa can not for very shame long continue to cherish the prejudices which inspire her present policy towards coloured people. It is therefore in the interests of South Africa and of Indians there who are an integral part of her population, that the Union's aspiration to figure on the Council of the League, should not be opposed, that it should, on the hand, be furthered by India.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Mr. Bose Explains :—Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose has explained that he is himself a Prohibitionist and total abstainer and that his criticisms of the Bombay scheme were meant only as suggestions to ensure its complete success. His assurance will, of course, be accepted. But he must acknowledge that his criticisms were ill-timed and were bound to embarrass the Ministery. He knew that there is an active and influential agitation to discredit and defeat Prohibition and that the criticisms of an ex-President of the Congress would be made use of, as they have been, by anti-Prohibitionists. There is, of course, not much common ground between people who fight for the liquor trade under the Union Jack, and one who wants to give six months' notice to the Union Jack to make way for the Charka flag. But political necessity makes strange bedfellows. The Bombay Prohibition policy has had to contend not only against the opposition of anti-Prohibitionists but also, against the interpretations of its avowed sponsors. Confusion was caused by the sudden emergance of nira, or niro, as a desirable substitute which will keep the tappers of toddy trees in employment. Opinion was divided as to what exactly nira was. It was affirmed that it contained a larger percentage of alcohol than beer. Confusion was worse confounded when Gandhiji declared that Prohibition was a misnomer to apply to the Congress policy, for which the responsibility was his; that what was prohibited was merely the sale of liquor by shops for which Government hitherto had issued licenses.

A Tell-Tale Contradiction :—An official or semi-official contradiction was published last week of a rumour that Dr. M. D. Gilder, Minister of Excise in the Bombay Cabinet, was resigning. Gandhiji's embarrassing interpretations of his policy totally without reference to his explicit assurances in the Legislative Assembly and to the public, must have made him uncomfortable and might have given rise to the rumour that the harassed Minister was leaving on a long sea-voyage early next month. The explanation issued last Saturday is that the only possible basis for the rumour was the renewing of his passport which expires on the 22nd July by Dr. Gilder, in order, it is naively explained, to avoid formalities. The only formality that would have been needed is to send round his chaprassi with the application for renewal to the Passport Officer in the next room in the Secretariat. A passport can be renewed by paying a rupee for every year covered by the renewal whereas a fresh passport has to be obtained by paying five rupees. It is hardly likely that Dr. Gilder wanted to save two or three rupees by renewing his passport on the eve of the introduction of the most important scheme of his ministerial career. If the author of the contradiction was not deceiving himself, one can see his tongue protruding into his cheek when he composed this screed.

MINISTERS' EMOLUMENTS.

A local daily called attention a few days ago to the violation by Congress Ministers of the rule laid down by the High Command that they should always travel by the lowest class available in trains. It affirmed that Congress Ministers often travel second class and that too in a compartment reserved for their exclusive use. That is to say, the provincial revenues have to pay the price of four or six second class tickets, which is equivalent to three first class ones. The rule regarding the lowest class cannot, of course, apply to means of transportation in which accommodation is not divided into economic classes. When travelling by them Ministers and Congress leaders are free to choose the best available. If Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru travelled by train to Ceylon he would have been expected to travel third or at most second class. Hiring a special aeroplane is another matter. There are no classes as yet in aeroplanes. The special plane is explained as being necessitated by the grave world situation which does not permit of the Pandit's being away from India except for the shortest possible period. When the Shukla Ministry succeeded Dr. Khare's in the Central Provinces, its first announcement was that, while its predecessors drew eight or nine annas a mile when they travelled by road, its members would be content with five annas only. Gandhiji, of course, always travels third class but the actual conditions in which he travels are not available to many first class passengers. The Bombay paper is not right in saying that Congress Ministers never travelled third class. They certainly tried it in the early days of office but found that the other passengers—the compartment became overcrowded by persons having grievances — would not allow them a moment's rest. The same thing happened in the second class. Reservation of their compartments was the only way of escape from this incessant and embarrassing attention of follow-passengers who took literally the slogan that Ministers were the servants of the people. All this only shows that the rule of the bureaucracy assigning a compartment to a Minister was not an act of wilful extravagance but dictated by pressing necessity. In other directions too Ministers are finding that their predecessors were not so wicked as they thought them to be. It may be recalled that the salaries of civil servants in India were levelled up by Clive in order to put down the corruption which was rampant among them. Congress leaders are many of them above reproach but already one hears more often than is pleasant of this or that leader having departed from the strict path of rectitude. The labourer is worthy of his hire. Bismarck used to say that he was prepared to devote himself body and soul to his country but he expected his country to keep him and his family well-fed and well-provided for. Bismark, it is true, was a frank philistine and never an aspirant to sainthood. But he knew his business as Minister. Inadequate salaries have ever implied an unlimited freedom to add to it by extra-legal gains. It is several months since we recommended the raising of Ministers' salaries to more adequate levels. This would enable the doing away with allowances which at present amount to indeterminate figures. It will also diminish the ardour of some Ministers to acquaint themselves personally with matters in the districts which are best left [to] settled by the local authorities. Corruption is [in]able when great responsibilities are [as]with insufficient emoluments. Saints and [as]who have renounced the world do not often [as]administer the Finance or the Public works of [a]ces. And it is a wise saying that [per]authority should not only be above corruption must be known and believed by the people [to] incorruptible. Poorly-paid Ministers are more [li]to be suspected of being corrupt than well-[p]officials though as a matter of fact the [diffe]may only be that, while the former is pleased [w]small baksheesh, the latter has to be propitiated [by]much larger one, if they are not men of [princi]Nevertheless if an official is naturally honest, [h]chances both of his remaining honest and of [his]known to be so, are greater if he has a [suffi]salary than if he had an insufficient one. In [the]latter case much of his energy will be [taxed]resisting temptations which in the former case [will]not arise. We are speaking, of course, [of]average man, and not of the exceptional individual.

FINANCING PROHIBITION.

We point out on another page that Mr. [Subhas]Bose's criticism of the Bombay Prohibition plan [is]ill-timed though well-meant. It has, [however]certainly not led to more confusion than Gandhi[ji's]nira campaign and repudiation of Prohibition as [the]right name for the modest measure undertaken [by]Congress Government. The present disposition [of]the Congress High Command to brush aside [any]criticism of their actions as proceeding from [enemies]of the Congress, can not impress any intelligent [man]as rational. Even if a critic was an enemy, it is [the]duty of leaders to examine his criticism and [rectify]any mistakes that there may be in their [plans]Not only Mr. Subhas Bose but also Dr. [Dr.]B. R. Ambedkar who knows that Prohibition [is]indispensable for the uplift of the depressed classes [has]has pointed out the defects in the financial [provisions]provisions tacked on to the Government scheme. [Even]Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyangar, an ex-President of the [All-India]National Congress and an ardent supporter of [Prohibition]Prohibition which he described in a recent speech [at]in Madras as the outstanding achievement of Congress [Ministries]gress Ministries, suggested that the financial [expedients]expedients adopted by them were not the best possible [and]ble and that in the circumstances Prohibition could [have]have been adopted with greater acceptance by the [public]public, if it had been associated with a better [considered]considered scheme for financing it. The fact has [got]got to be faced that there is not to-day the same [feeling]feeling that Prohibition as a means of ensuring [total]total abstinence, is a pressing need, as [there]there was a generation ago. We have [ourselves]ourselves been surprised at the indifference shown [towards]towards Prohibition in quarters where we should [have]have expected much enthusiasm. The adverse [comments]comments, for example of the Subodh Patrika, the [organ]organ of the Bombay Prarthana Samaj, [pained]pained and surprised us. There seems [to]be a general feeling that the danger [of]intemperance through intoxicating drinks, which [was]was serious a generation ago, has been [to]a great extent countered by the influence of [social]social and religious reform movements as well as by [the]the recognition all over the world of the harmful [nature]nature and functions of alcohol in the human system. until the nefarious business is completely eradicated. Such a long view does not readily appeal to the man in the street, and when he is asked to pay for protection against a temptation against which he is steeled by habit and conviction, he feels that the sacrifice demanded of him must not cripple his resources for meeting the immediate and urgent needs of himself and his family. One of the canons of taxation is that it should not bear with disproportionate incidence on the taxpayer. The Indian equivalent of this principle, as stated picturesquely in the classics, is that the ruler should gather his taxes as the bee does the honey from the flower without hurting it. Most of the criticism of the Bombay scheme from people who are personally total abstainers and are supporters of Prohibition, is that not enough consideration has been bestowed on the incidence on the taxpayer. This everybody knows is due to Gandhiji's demand that Prohibition must be introduced in three years. Other provinces have not seen their way to accept this time-limit but the Bombay Government has evidently done so. Hence it has had no time to evolve a more rational scheme of taxation to meet the deficit. It has laid hands on the Bombay property owner as he is at hand and could not evade the tax. But it should remember that it has accepted a no-tax campaign as a legitimate means of protest and has even consecrated it by legislating for the return of lands confiscated for non-payment of revenue in pursuance of the Civil Disobedience movement to the defaulters. We say all this not as a reason for giving up the Prohibition policy. Government can not do that and it should not be done. They must now go with redoubled vigour and in order to do so they should readjust at the end of the financial year the scheme of taxation so as to fall more evenly on willing shoulders. They should welcome criticism and not get irritated by it even though in all cases it may not be unalloyed by party motives. Not the motives but the substance of criticism, is the essential thing to consider. Congress governments are handicapped by the absence of effective criticism. Any one who supplies this deficiency, should be regarded as a friend. In the circumstances, indeed, an enemy may prove to be the best friend.

THE LEFTISTS AND MASS ORGANISATION.

(By J. M. Ganguli, Calcutta.)

One hears often today of our leaders' evincing interest in the masses. The masses must be politically educated; they should be told what their rights are and how they remain deprived of them; and they must be organised and trained so that they may give necessary backing to the national movement for political emancipation;—thus say the national leaders. The Congress Left-wing leaders are, in particular, referring to the masses of late, and as against the insipidity inherent in red-taped constitutionalism adopted by the Rightists, they affirm that the infusion of a spirit of revolutionism in the masses is what is needed to dispel the present lull and accelerate the progress towards the Congress goal.

What they say is not without truth. Mere constitutionalism with all its virtues has some drawbacks also, specially when applied to people, who, having remained in abject political inactivity and subjection for many centuries, have lost all fight in them, and have been reduced to a state of resignation at whatever comes their way. To revive their vitality for self-assertiveness, to rebuild their power of resistance, and to re-kindle their enthusiasm for organising for ameliorating their condition, it is no doubt true that greater stimulation should be put into them than what comes through uninspiring constitutionalism. For a nation on the run constitutionalism has added merit and revolutionism, which may cause dangerous and unexamined diversions, may have to be guarded against; but a nation lying for ages in a state of stupor and cowardly despondency has to be stirred up and its mentality revolutionised.

If, therefore, the Leftists would hurl that argument at the Rightists they would not be without footing on some reasons; but the point that concerns me in this article is to what extent the former are themselves translating that argument into practice with regard to the masses. Does it not seem that their own contact with the masses is only remote and far between? What they do is generally to travel from city to city, addressing institutions and associations, to win support for their view-points, leaving the actual work of stimulating the masses forgotten and neglected. It is the intelligentsia which they address, and seldom the masses. Gandhiji's phenomenal success in India has been due to the fact that he closely identified himself with the masses in all manner and approached and spoke to them direct. The Socialists and left-wingers, on the contrary, while realising the necessity of having the masses with them, and while professing doctrines which directly relate to them, are apparently not temperamentally suited to move with the masses and work among them. But that disqualification they have to remove if they really want to organise the masses for a successful struggle for freedom. Popularising their views with the intelligentsia is of course necessary, but to confine oneself to that alone is for a mass leader not to mean business.

Is that not, however, what they are practically doing, the anti-Reformists, the anti-Constitutionalists, the Socialists, the Radicals and others. Newspapers publish their speeches in extenso, audiences give them applause: But go into the country and you will find that the masses have heard little of them, and have understood less what they actually mean to do and what they expect them to do. It is indeed unfortunate that those enthusiastic leaders, who have a lot of energy and inspiration in them, should not think of coming down from theory into actual work, by rolling up their sleeves and going direct to the masses to organise them for the fighting line. The intelligentsia can be influenced through the press, but the illiterate masses have to be personally approached. What a pitiable state of inaction and helplessness they are in today! Even in small things directly affecting their domestic and local life they seldom think of organising for effecting improvements, whether it be in respect of local sanitation or drainage, or whether in the matter of co-operating for stocking, grading, rate-fixing and marketing their field produce. It is all the same. The blood-sucking bania comes and deals with them by turn, advancing some money and binding them rigidly under irredeemable conditions. The foreign piece-goods dealer goes and sells to them at uncontested prices, robbing them of their vital savings, if any, and killing whatever cottage weaving industry may have been left at places. Commercial adventurers penetrate into the country to introduce current tastes, e. g. cigarette-smoking, tea-drinking. In every manner, in fact, the country is being exploited, but its masses have neither the thought nor the organisational ability to resist.

Such being the condition, if the masses have to be aroused into sufficient self-consciousness for joining in the national struggle for political freedom, it is more than necessary for the leaders to pass at least most of their time with them and spend all their energy in educating and organising them. The educated town people can well comprehend the comparative significance of constitutionalism and radicalism bordering on revolutionism; but such mere comprehension, though that may affect party strength, will not materially advance the political cause of the country so long as the masses are not forthcoming to give their intelligent and concerted weight from behind. For the absence of such mass support the Sepoy Mutiny failed, and the Civil Disobedience movement has not succeeded.

The leaders, no doubt, realise all that, but they do not seem to be taking up the necessary task in right earnest and are frittering away their energies in lecturing to gain supremacy in the Congress. What hope would there be if such self-seeking mentality were to influence them? If one group comes into power, cannot the other groups think of doing anything else than going about preaching and collecting votes for themselves? Why can they not look at the situation from a broad, national point of view and work in their own way to supplement the work of others, so as to achieve the goal that is admittedly common to them? The Right, the Left, the Socialists, the Radicals and all agree unreservedly on political independence as the goal of their aspirations. They also agree that mass consciousness and mass assertiveness are essential for success. Why not then go out into the country to move and organise the masses, jointly and co-operatively, if you please, inspite of your varying theories, and party denominations, or separately if that be inspiring to you? The Rightists are in power. You may think that had you been in power you could have done this better, you could have done that better. You may be right; but, never mind; till then, you may very well go on working in the country and organising the people there. As Soialists, work out their economic improvement, and make them economically self-dependent. Remove their illiteracy and explain to them how their country's political freedom will benefit them. Teach them how to improve their local conditions by joint effort without depending on Government help. Tell them what irresistable power they can wield over their Government only if they would be combined and determined. Show them the evil results to which communalism leads. Help them to manage their own affairs.

In such primary mass work will the Rightists, who are governing the Congress Provinces, obstruct? Surely not. Rather they would give patronage and protection. Let those, therefore, who are dissatisfied with the Rightists show good spirit and their sincerity and earnestness to serve the masses and work for the common goal. The idea of a parallel government has been advanced by some of them. Let them prove the practicability of it by making the masses self-sufficient and self-dependent, managing their own affairs by village unions, panchayats, etc. But that work would require patience and perseverance. Impatience will not do. You cannot make millions of people, who have lost their vitality and confidence under long political subjection, revolutionaries over-night by short-cut methods, avoiding intensive organisational work among them. The fact none should overlook, if the national goal is not to be allowed to recede in the horizon.

CHINESE STUDENTS AND THE WAR.

(By Walter Brooks Foley, Manila.)

There is a deliberate effort on the part of the Japanese to try to fraternize with the Chinese people through the Japanese sponsored societies and even Christian pastors, and also to bestow small favours upon the ignorant and the poor. But in the "occupied" areas the best people have moved away. The Japanese exercise complete control over finances and education. In the North the Japanese have tried to manipulate the currency by issuing notes through the so-called Federal Reserve Bank and to monopolize the market by dumping Japanese goods. Text-books have to be examined and the objectionable passages deleted or distorted. Students are forced to join victory parades. There is also a prevalence of vices such as opium dens, brothels and gambling houses. The "badlands" in the western district of Shanghai are hot-beds of terroristic activities of all kinds. In short, the "New Order" means really "disorder", exploitation of Chinese resources, degeneration of her people and elimination of third party interests.

There has been a vast destruction of Chinese schools and universities by Japanese artillery fire and extensive aerial bombing. It is estimated that at least 52 colleges and universities have been disabled or put out of commission since the outbreak of the war. As a matter of fact, with the exception of four universities in Peking, only the very few universities and colleges located in free China, can operate on their own campuses. The deliberate bombing and burning of Nankai University, Tung Chi University, Great China University, and Kwang Hua University in Shanghai, the Central University in Nanking, Hunan University in Changsha, the National Sun Yat-sen University in Canton and Amoy University in Amoy, lead us to believe that the destruction of Chinese cultural and educational institutions is the result of the careful plans of the Japanese military. Universities which have not thus suffered, have been occupied by the Japanese soldiers as barracks or even as stables.

This destruction has resulted in an unprecedented student migration towards the interior. A number of universities and schools have moved thousands of miles into Szechuan, Kweichow and Yunnan. There are epic tales of these migrations, such as the long march of the Temporary University from Changsha to Kumming, and the continuous moving of National Chekiang University from Hangchow to Yishan, Kwangsi. Cities like Kumming in Yunnan, and Kweiyang have suddenly sprung up as important cultural centres. Two years ago Kumming could boast of only one struggling provincial university with about 200 students. Now this Yunnan University has an enrolment of 600 students and besides, there are the National Southwestern University, combining the original Peking, Tsing Hua and Nankai Universities, the National Chung Cheng Medical College, the National Tung Chi University, the National College of Physical Education, the National Sun Yat-sen University, Tangshan Engineering College of Chiao Tung University, and Hua Chung College. Kweiyang is now the medical centre of interior China. It has three medical colleges, namely, the brand-new National Kweiyang Medical College, Hunan-Yale Medical College and the Kiangsu Provincial Medical College. Then there is the Great China University which has moved there from Shanghai. There is also another direction of migration. That is towards the foreign areas of Hongkong, Kowloon, Kulangsu and the International Settlement of Shanghai. Shanghai has now become practically the largest university centre in the whole of the country. It has about one-fifth of the total college and middle school population of the whole country.

The government policy is to encourage the universities and colleges to carry on as far as possible. The Ministry of Education has assisted the moving of the universities and students into the interior. More than 20,000 college students have been on government relief. Besides establishing the two National Associated Universities, one in the Northwest and the other in the Southwest, the Ministry of Education has also established five new colleges and universities. There are also nine new governmental middle schools which have a combined enrolment of over 10,000 students and cost the government about a million dollars a month. A system for "guest students" so as to enable the refugee students to study in other universities has been established. People in other countries may ask why the government should encourage the universities to go on under war conditions. The answer is simply that China has only a small number of college students. In normal times the total number of college students is about 45,000. The number may have been reduced to 30,000. If we set this against the total population of 450,000,000 the college students constitute a very precious group for the reconstruction of China. And, there are sufficient armies to carry on the present war of resistance.

Students are of three kinds. The first are those who are determined to continue their studies, especially those who are comparatively wealthy, and those who are nearing their graduation. The second are those who hesitate to continue their education, and want to do some work that is related to the war of resistance. Many of these have gone to Yenan, others have joined the troops, and still others render services among the wounded soldiers, civilian refugees and the country masses. The third are those who are refugeeing in the different cities. They are stranded because their financial resources are cut off and their families are scattered or killed. The Ministry of Education, the International Student Service Committee, and the National Student Relief Committees of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. are each doing their part in giving relief to the refugee students.

On the whole, the Christian students have a favourable attitude towards the war of resistance. They realize the importance of supporting the united front in the present political struggle, although they may not understand very clearly what is to be their unique contribution or the relationship of Christianity to national salvation. There are still some Christians who hesitate to use violence. They feel that non-violence is a Christian ideal, but under the present conditions the Chinese people can hardly put it into practice. Others feel that China's resistance is justified in the fact that the Chinese are fighting for justice and peace. They feel that while the Christian Church is not a political movement, it is highly desirable that Christian individuals, in the face of gross injustice and the cruelty of suffering, should take some political action. The emphasis on the unity and fellowship of a World Christian Community leads the Chinese Christians to re-examine the whole idea of reconciliation between Japan and China. They believe unity and fellowship between Christians of two hostile countries are unreal if they are not based on equality, common recognition of injustices and absolute freedom from political manipulation and that there can be no neutrality or equivocation on the issue between right and wrong. Christians, they say, must stand out clearly against aggression in international relationships and uphold the sanctity of the pledged word. "Let love be without hypocrisy" is their basis for any Christian reconciliation. China is clearly and increasingly developing a system and ideology which will make for a secure base both of Christian and democratic principles in the Orient. She is losing her old life forms, but is adding to her spiritual, economic, political, and social resources. She is on the side of right which has a habit of ultimate victory.

CONGRESS AND CORRUPTION.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Anent your comments on my article on "The Congress and Corruption" in the Reformer of the 1st July, it seems I have not been correctly understood. It was far from me to suggest, nor do I really think, that "before the Gandhian epoch, all Indian politicians were crooked." Rather I believe that there were many sincere and high-moraled leaders then as now. My point is that in those days honesty of purpose and moral virtue were not emphasised as necessary qualifications for political leadership as was directly and indirectly done by Gandhiji. And, therefore, those who modelled their lives on pure ideals did so of their own accord and not out of their innate convictions in ethical principles developed in them through good environmental education and upbringing. Under Gandhian influence, however, leaders had to accept those principles as a policy of the Congress, resorting to hypocrisy when their practical application in their own lives did not suit their nature, temperament and outlook. I give credit to Gandhiji for having realised the necessity of moral force in national workers, and having, therefore, insisted on their having a high normal standard; but my complaint is that while stressing on the same he has been slack in its enforcement.

As to your concluding remarks, I do not mean that Gandhiji should constitute himself into an Investigation Committee examining the character-sheets of all Congressmen. I only hold that it is necessary for him and for the Congress to be at least sure of the top leaders. And it does not seem to me that it will be either very long or too difficult to know the antecedents and present tendencies of those handful of men, about whom the lay public also know much. Need I repeat that it is hardly possible to maintain any standard in public morality, if public leaders care to have none?

Yours etc.,

J. M. GANGULI.

ANTI-SEGREGATION IN THE U. S. A.

The Servant of India calls attention to a movement in the U. S. A., which is in striking contrast with the policies advocated and imposed in South Africa. The Washington correspondent of the Madras Mail reported as follows:

"No more significant social charge has taken place in the United States since the Civil War of three-quarters of a century ago than that now being promoted by legislation in many of the most populous States. The most radical of all has just passed the New York legislature and comes in force on July 25. It imposes a penalty of both fine and imprisonment for failure to give equal rights to all persons, of whatever colour or race, in hotels, show houses, privately operated buildings for business or residential purposes, restaurants or any enterprise open to the public. With similar but less far-reaching statutes recently enacted in several of the more important States, a profound forward step has been taken to ensure social freedom for the Negroes, who form one out of every nine persons in the nation. The United States constitution long has provided equal status for all citizens, following Lincoln's Gettysburg address, but the Congress never implemented the two amendments by legislation, letting each commonwealth devise its own methods of enforcement. This change has no relation to the prowess of coloured men as college champions in track athletics or in football, their current dominance in three major classes of prize fighting, the fact that a negro woman is the leading mezzo-soprano concert singer of the country, or the successes of eloquent Negro preachers, lawyers, playwrights, actors and musicians.

"The credit for this social advance must be ascribed largely to the coloured people themselves. In their great emigration from the South to the North in the last twenty years they have not sought to edge themselves in where they were not wanted. They accepted patiently the advice of their more gifted leaders that culture should precede demands for their civil rights. So it was that when New York City started two huge residential enterprises for coloured people, equal in every respect to the non-slum homes for low salaried white persons, there was no protest of race discrimination even in districts which elect Negroes to the State legislature, minor judges and members of the City Council. They did not intrude into white public schools where adequate educational facilities were provided in districts predominantly occupied by the black race. The more fortunate in a financial sense avoided the fashionable night clubs, general hotels, high class restaurants and similarly took modest seats in theatres, symphony concerts and other public performances. They challenged no race question. They mingled promiscuously with their white neighbours only in the transit conveyances, the public parks and the seaside beaches. They provided their own doctors, dentists, hairdressers, laundries, garages and incidental business outlets. The fact that members of their race passed brilliantly in the West Point examinations for the army and at Annapolis for the navy, insuring them an officer's rank, brought no racial rush for equal recognition, nor did their high rating for many positions in the civil service."

THE HINDU MUSLIM PROBLEM.*

Mr. B. K. Mallik's thought-provoking book entitled "The Individual and the Group" is well worth reading by all interested in India and her problems. It is based on discussions which took place at Calcutta, during the summer of 1936 when a group of earnest Bengali men met to find, if possible, a solution for the Hindu-Muslim Problem which threatens to destroy India.

Beginning with the Muslim conquest, Mr. Mallik shows that the Mohammedan social structure in India took on a Hindu pattern, and for centuries the conquerors and the conquered lived peaceably together in their joint life in the village community. Islam became a section or caste of Hinduism. The Muslims altered neither the Hindu social system nor its laws. Nor did they set up a new system as a rival or as a model.

What then, asks the author, caused the Muslims to resent the Hindus? Why did the Indian Muslim ally himself with the British Government in the name of Islam? Why did he oppose Nationalism which grew out of the creed adopted by his co-religionists in Turkey, Egypt and Persia? Has the Indian Muslim forgotten that it was from his forefathers the British wrested all power and influence—for the Moghuls were the sovereign rulers of the country then—and gave it to the Hindus by creating them landlords and holding them responsible for the raising of the revenue? Thus the British sowed seeds of resentment in the minds of the Muslims. That the trouble is not religious but political and economic, was the opinion of this group of thinkers, for with the disappearance of the Indian village and its joint community life, [illegible] the spectre of the Hindu-Muslim Problem.

The author leaves his reader with food for thought by stating that the Indian problem is distinct [illegible] the Hindu-Mohammedan problem, and by asking whether the human race can survive if the only known systems of society, the Individual and the Group, break down.

BOMBAY GOVERNOR AND PROHIBITION.

The following communique has been issued by the Bombay Government:

In response to inquiries, His Excellency the Governor has been pleased to issue the following statement on the steps which he has decided to take at Government House in Bombay when Prohibition comes into operation:

"All entertaining of an official nature will be dry. This will mean that all large functions will be dry. I have made this decision for the reason that I consider that entertaining of this kind should be wholly in line with the main purpose of the policy of Government.

"For entertaining of a private nature at which guests not eligible for permits are present, I shall prefer to make no distinction among my guests, and on these occasions, therefore, no alcoholic drinks will be served.

"For ordinary use of myself and my staff at Government House, and for private entertaining when only those eligible for permits are present, I shall make arrangements in accordance with the facilities provided for permit holders."

MR. JOAD ON THE GOSPELS.

II.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your last issue you reproduced an article which Professor Joad contributed to the Spectator, on "The Gospels Re-Read" and you referred appreciatively to it. I do not wish to enter into controversy on the subject, but I have been told that if no reply is made some may understand that no reply is possible. Many replies have already been made and some of them have been printed in the Spectator, but some of your readers may not have access to it. I would only say, firstly, that the impression that a reading of the Gospels made on Professor Joad is not the impression which it has made on the minds of most earnest students, whether Christian or non-Christian, and secondly, that some of the statements which Professor Joad makes are demonstrably incorrect.

I shall say no more, but I would express the hope that with that impartiality for which the Reformer has ever been famed, you will find space to reprint the other articles on the Gospels in the series which Professor Joad has inaugurated.

WEST OF SUEZ.

Prof. L. Rushbrook Williams writes in The Asiatic Review

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

THE TRADITIONAL HOME OF THE SANDALWOOD TREE.

It is in perfumery that the greater proportion of Sandalwood Oil is employed at the present day and to discriminating buyers, such as perfumers and soap manufacturers must of necessity be, it is hardly necessary to extol the virtues of the East Indian Oil which is without equal, both as a fine perfume base and a fixative for the increasingly popular bouquets of the Oriental type. In addition it is now being used extensively, and with marked success, in the creation of some of the more delicate perfumes in which the Sandalwood odour is not required as a predominant character.

A few trials will convince the perfumer who has not taken full advantage of the odour-value of this oil, that is of the greatest use to him, not only for predominant Sandalwood odour where required, but also a modifier and a fixative for other odours. This is true for liquid perfumes, soaps, creams, powders and all other cosmetic preparations. It will be found invaluable to those up-to-date perfumers who pride themselves on their own "creations."

NOTES.

Indians Overseas :—It is high time that the Indian public made up its mind regarding the policy which has to be followed in dealing with the problems of Indians overseas. Until Gandhiji began his campaign in South Africa, very little was known or heard of the existence of Indians overseas. Returned emigrants from Zanzibar, and East Africa, Ceylon, Singapore and Mauritius were generally more prosperous than their neighbours and there was a general impression that much money could be more easily made abroad than at home. The plight of the indentured labourers in South Africa, Fiji, Guiana and other places, was not known. After the awakening caused by the Passive Resistance movement in South Africa, the position of Indians there and in other parts of the world, began to attract public attention. The indentured system was abolished. Indians everywhere are now free workers. They fall into two classes: the descendants of indentured labourers who were mostly born in the several colonies and have never been and have no prospect of visiting India; and traders, merchants, mechanics and officials who have migrated to make their fortunes, have kept up connections with the mother country, and, generally speaking, expect to spend the evening of their lives in the mother country. The best thing that could happen to the first class is to become assimilated wherever possible to the rest of the local population, as there is no prospect of India adopting the Fascist and Nazi policy of bringing all persons of Italian and German descent under Italian and German political and economic control. India's policy towards this class should be such as to facilitate this process. If this is unacceptable, India will have to do much more than she is doing to establish closer cultural, social and spiritual relations between herself and Indians born and brought up in the colonies. To the merchants and professional classes who maintain their connections with India, India's responsibility amounts only to ensuring just and fair treatment in the colonies. For both these purposes, it is essential that India should define exactly what her position is to be in the British Empire. If her goal is separation from the Empire, her way of dealing with the problem must be different from what it should be if it is to function as a Free State within the Empire.

Snobbery in Excelsis :—In the division of communities for the electoral franchise under the Reforms, Christians were divided into three separate groups: Indian Christians, Europeans and Anglo-Indians. As popularly understood, a European is one both of whose parents are Europeans. But the Government of India Act defines the term as meaning one whose father or any of whose male progenitors is or was of European descent. The term Anglo-Indian bears the same meaning. The difference between the two turns on the fact whether a person is or is not a "Native of India" this term including any person born and domiciled in India or Burma "of parents habitually resident in either country and not established there for temporary purposes only." Thus a person both of whose parents are Europeans, and a person of mixed parentage are both Anglo-Indians under the Act, if the former was born of parents habitually resident in India. This has led to an interesting controversy. A number of Europeans in the popular sense of the term, have made their homes in India. These were known in ordinary parlance as "domiciled Europeans" and were distinguished from Anglo-Indians who had only a male European progenitor. Although these "domiciled Europeans" were regarded as somewhat inferior to the imported European in social intercourse, they were for most other purposes treated as equals. The European Association of Calcutta recently intimated to a domiciled European who had been long one of its members, that he should resign and join the local Association of Anglo-Indians, as his community was grouped with the latter for electoral purposes. The controversy has extended to Bombay. Communal distinctions tend to be less clear-cut here than in Calcutta. The attitude of the Calcutta European Association is not quite to the taste of the Bombay Association.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

But there is the hard fact that the domiciled European is for election purposes grouped statutionly with the Anglo-Indian. In a rather amusing attempt to find a via media, the President of the Bombay European Association advances the astounding proposition that an Anglo-Indian has only to declare that he intends when he retires to settle not in India but in Europe, and that he forthwith becomes under the law a European and is eligible to be put on the European electoral roll. That is to say what is enfranchised by the Government of India Act is not the fact that a man has always had his home in India but the intention that at some future time he intends to settle down somewhere North of Suez!

Defence of India :—Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, Prime Minister of the Punjab, was in Bombay a few days in connection with the meetings of the Working Committee of the Moslem League of which he is a prominent member. He spoke at a meeting of what is known as the Indian Progressive Party on the Indian situation. We commented last week on his plan for a new Indian Federation based on what he described as seven regional divisions, of which the main feature would be that the centre can be dominated by the circumference. He devoted some remarks to the question of India's Defence. The Muslim League has declared, following the Indian National Congress, that the goal which it aims at achieving is Independence. But as we observed last week, Sir Sikandar often forgets that he is a leader of the League and should not say anything publicly which is opposed to its aims and objects. As a soldier, he said, he realised the difficulty of defending a country with such a long coastline as India. That India has a long coastline is apparent even to a civilian. It is a geographical fact. A few days after the Punjab Premier's speech it was announced that there was to be a conference at Simla between representatives of the Burma and Indian Governments with a view to concerted action for the defence of the two countries. It was incidentally mentioned in the message containing the announcement that Singapore was the first line and Burma the second line of Indian defence. If this is the case, the coastline of India does not count in the least as the enemy would be presumably smashed before he emerges from the Malaya Straits or at any rate before he enters the Bay of Bengal. The implications of this new theory of defence of India take one's breath away. The late Lord Salisbury when he was Secretary of State for India in the seventies of the last century warned Lord Lytton, then Viceroy of India, to beware of Army experts. They will not be satisfied, he said, until they have extended your frontiers to the moon. Indian leaders should be on their guard to prevent the country being committed to fabulous expenditure to defend India at Singapore!

Mr. Subhas Bose on Prohibition :—There [illegible] many people who are not interested primarily [illegible] politics, who think that the way in which [illegible] Congress High Command handled [illegible] situation arising out of the election of [illegible] Subhas Chandra Bose to the Presidentship of [illegible] Congress, was wanting not only in magnanimity [illegible] which counts even in politics, but verged [illegible] on the vindictive; and who appreciate [illegible] courageous stand he is making against [illegible] assumption of arbitrary authority by what [illegible] called the Right Wing. He would have done well if he had concentrated his efforts on the question of principle involved in the claim of the High Command to Mr. Bose's abject and unquestioning obedience to their dictates, a claim which strikes at the root of Indian politics as a movement for greater freedom. Unfortunately he has not been able to resist the temptation to win the support of anti-Prohibitionists by denouncing the Prohibition policy of the Bombay Government which he had, according to Mr. K. M. Munshi, welcomed when it was announced last year as President of the Congress. Partial Prohibition which he favours, would not to any extent achieve the end in view of weaning the poorest and most depressed classes from the curse of drink. So long as the well-to-do classes drink, the masses can not be prevented from doing likewise. As experience shows, the masses always follow the example of their betters. By attacking Prohibition, Mr. Bose has descended from the high ground of political principle to the low level of political partisanship. He has thrown away, in order to secure a small temporary access to his following, the great advantage which he possessed so long as he stood for a broad principle. His views on Prohibition are shallow and have been proved, wherever partial prohibition has been tried, to be ineffectual. Nobody thinks that the Bombay Government's scheme of taxation for meeting the Prohibition deficit is an ideal one. They had apparently not much time to think out a more equitable plan which would distribute the incidence of taxation equitably so that a few thousand householders in Bombay City and suburbs had not to bear the full brunt of a policy meant for the whole province. Collection of the new tax could have been made less burdensome by providing for its realisation in two or three instalments. But all this only shows that Government have not had time to consider administrative details. But details must not be allowed to overshadow the great purpose of the measure which has been launched. The general public, we believe, quite realise this and there will be many who will find it impossible to continue to think of Mr. Bose's revolt as wholly one of high principle.

Sino-Japanese Affairs:—The position in China at the moment seems to show little sign of improvement. The Chinese after realising the hopelessness of expecting help from the democracies either through the League of Nations or otherwise, have evidently been disappointed in another expectation, that Japanese aggressiveness towards the international settlements would embroil Japan with the European Powers. Britain has decided to negotiate with the aggressor. The Times of India which seeks to reflect British opinion, attempted a propaganda to make action against Japan acceptable to Indians on ideological grounds. "We in this country," it wrote on June 19, "must remember that a stand is not being "made for the Foreign Concessions but for something bigger. The issue is this: are the peace powers to support an aggressor nation against one which for thousands of years has never once invaded another's territory but has consistently pursued a policy of peace without parallel in the history of the world?" Not even the most rabid pro-Chinese could have stated the issue more clearly. But unfortunately or fortunately, Britain opened negotiations with Japan and the Times of India promptly wrote (July 7) :

> On the eve of the British-Japanese talks on the Tientsin blockade, it is encouraging to reflect that conditions in the British Concession are much improved. Thanks to the stand taken by the British Foreign Office, the Japanese are honouring their promise to put an end to stripping, searching and "similar incidents." In fact a relaxation in the atmosphere at Tientsin has been noticeable ever since it was known that a discussion was to take place at Tokio. British subjects are reported to be returning to the Concession, and it appears that British residents are not going short of necessary foodstuffs. A factor largely contributing to the easing of tension was the British Municipal Council's proclamation warning the Chinese public in the British Concession that all offenders would in future be either handed over to the Japanese or deported. This represented an abandonment of the internment policy, which was unpopular in Japanese eyes because it was considered to have helped terrorism. Opinions and publications contrary to the policy of the Japanese-appointed Peiping Government are also being suppressed.

Obviously the attitude of Western Powers to the Sino-Japanese dispute is to be based on the position of the international settlements. If Japan is ready to tolerate them, then Japan is to be favoured. If China is more likely to bear with the settlements, then all the good qualities of the Chinese and the moral issues of the conflict are brought out. Even Dr. Foley whose genuine sympathy with the Chinese is beyond question, does not hesitate in his article this week to use the tempting bait of "third party interests" to induce democratic support to China. If the democratic powers are really in favour of China, they could take no more effective step than to declare their intention to give up international settlements which have no moral or international justification for existing. In any case whichever way the present war ends, we do not see how the settlements can be kept up. A report from Tokio and Peiping says that the Japanese contemplate a kind of Federation for the Japanese occupied part of China, with Mr. Wang Ching-Wei as the head. Unlike Dr. Foley, Mr. Ching Wei seems to regard resistance as futile and favours an early settlement with Japan. Probably he was led to this view by the example of the British Government who hope to settle the Tientsein dispute by negotiation. Mr. Ching Wei, at any rate, does not regard the Japanese terms as ruinous to China.

Rejoinders to Professor Joad:—Professor Joad's article "The Gospels Re read" which we reprinted from the Spectator last week has provoked a number of rejoinders. We say "provoked" but in most of the replies we are struck by the almost total absence of resentment at the candid opinions expressed by the Professor. Except for one letter in which the writer says he was deeply shocked to read such an article in the Spectator, nearly all the other writers display a spirit of tolerance which would have been rare in such controversies twenty years ago. The most important of the rejoinders is by Mr. H. G. Wood who suggests that erroneous translation is responsible for much misunderstanding. For instance, "Take no thought of the morrow" should be rendered "Be not anxious for the morrow." Jesus, Mr. Wood observes, has no philosophy of religion, no systematic ethics. He was no rabbi, no social reformer. Jesus' sayings and doings had only one inspiration; they reflect his absolute trust in God. "If he was mistaken in His confidence in God," continues Mr. Wood, "Jesus meant less to us than many other teachers. If He was justified, no other teacher can mean so much to us." Professor Joad had remarked with reference to Christ's faith in God's Providence that millions of Christians have starved and are starving. One of the correspondents avers that those who act on Christian principles will not generally suffer for want of food and drink. "During a long lifetime", declares Mr. Angus Watson, "I have never known such". One of the writers explains that Jesus meant some sayings which are perplexing, in an ironical sense. The saying about making friends with the mammon of unrighteousness, he says, was intended as a hit at Judas. The Rev. A. H. T. Clarke points out that Prof. Joad's defence of the Sermon on the Mount is based on a false premise. It was not spoken to or for the world but to and only for his disciples. The most striking comment on Professor Joad's article is that of Mr. Philip Leon who says that he read the Gospels for the first time with no Christian background at the age of twenty-four. "Mr. Joad's impression on re-reading the Gospels was rather like mine on first reading them," he writes.

> The impression made on me by my first reading of the Gospels and on Mr. Joad by his second reading of them must, it seems to me, resemble exactly the impression produced by Jesus Himself on the Pharisees of His times, who were after all, good, idealistic, cultured people like Mr. Joad and myself. It is the impression which those who have reproduced the spirit of Jesus in the way called for by the spirit of their age, have always made on the Pharisees of that particular age.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, July 15, 1939.

DEMOCRACY AND DICTATORSHIP.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. The present conflict between Dictatorship and Democracy has forced the latter to look into itself. Introspection reveals the fact that the two are not necessarily antithetical. There is dictatorship within democracy. In fact, many people are beginning to question whether much of what passes for democracy is not merely veiled dictatorship. In the course of his opening remarks at the May session of the American Academy of Political Science, Professor Coudert of Columbia University let fall the parenthetical remark that he hated the word "democracy" because it was so vague and largely meaningless. The present conflict has forced democracy to define itself. The meaning which is most commonly attached to it is that it is synonymous with majority rule. But majority rule may be a tyranny quite as well as autocratic rule. That it is so and must be so, is the basis of the doctrine of minority rights which has become an integral part of post-war political philosophy. This doctrine has, indeed, been pushed so far as virtually to amount to the dogma that the majority has for its sole function to placate the minority, in practice the most vocal and most determined minority, at the expense often of smaller and less assertive minorities. In India this is illustrated by the slogan of Hindu-Muslim unity, to the exclusion of Christians, Jews, Parsis, who, it is assumed, will have no cause for complaint under a coalition of the majority with the largest minority community. This is in consonance with the Benthamite doctrine of the greatest good of the greatest number with its corollary of the devil take the hindmost. Even the majority which is supposed to rule, does not in fact rule. Once in five years or so constituencies are called upon to decide on one or two clear-cut issues placed before them by politicians who seek their suffrage. When the elections are over and the one or the other party is safely ensconced in office, these issues are forgotten or give place to other issues which were not considered by the electorates. A glaring case was the last British General Elections when Lord Baldwin was returned to power on the cry of collective security through the League of Nations. He resigned a year later. His successor and his colleagues threw collective security to the winds and Mr. Neville Chamberlain advised the League to give up its political pretensions and confine itself to social service. He has since returned to collective security but without the League of Nations, through a Peace Front to be formed by three League members, Britain, France and Russia, guaranteeing the security, in most cases without their consent, of some others also members of the League. The British people are assumed to have authorised the British Cabinet in all their contradictory acts during the last four years. The position of Government in the Hou... Commons has been greatly strengthened b... increased salary provided for Members and ... substantial stipend assigned to the Leade... the Opposition two years ago. No wonder ... in these hard times Members of Parliame... not care to assert their independence. The d... of Government would involve a disso... and the hazards of a General Election.

The classic definition of Democracy is L... coln's catching phrase "government of ... people, by the people, for the people." Ex... rience, even in the United States which ha... in view, shows that the only part that is cer... about democracy is that it is government of ... people. It can be called government by ... people, only in a conventional, not to say iron... sense. As for its being government for ... people, the odds are nearly the same as in ... case of an oligarchy or an autocracy. The... may even be said to be rather less. Thoughtf... men have come to feel that there should ... some other definition of Democracy in addi... to, or in substitution of, Lincoln's and ... have specified certain attributes without wh... even though popularly elected no Governme... can be called democratic. We quoted so... time back Lord Lothian's definition of democra... with the remark that it might stand ... well as one of Christianity. That is to s... democracy is distinguished from autocra... or dictatorship by certain moral qualit... which, however, are not necessarily incompati... with other forms of government. In fa... they are not inherent in democracy in ... sense that democracy can not dispense w... them. This is evident from the fact that t... great democracies of Europe, Great Britain a... France, have large colonial Empires, larger ... area and more populous than themselves, whi... they rule on totally non-democratic principle... Writing of the British Colonial Empire, ... Spectator observes: "Here in the colonia... and mandatory territories, democracy has ... to dictate while it educates, and in its rule ... extreme cases is only differentiated fro... dictatorship by the degree in which British publ... opinion, asserting itself on behalf of backwa... races, can influence the administration." This ... as is notorious, seldom happens. The British ... people are engrossed in their own struggle fo... existence which is becoming increasingly severe... every year. They are also frightened when ... they are told as they were by Lord Birkenhead ... that to lose India by giving her self-government ... would add to unemployment in Great Britain ... or by Lord Rothermere that five shillings ... in the pound of the income of every Britis... come from India and will be lost if India ... is not kept under the control of Whitehall. ... The scandalous breach of faith with Indians ... in South and East Africa evokes no protest ... or only a feeble, ineffectual one from the ... British public. The hardships of the Africans ... excite even less interest. Liberal opinion in ... England, reflected in weeklies like the Economist and the Spectator, do not therefore attach the same importance to the cry that Dictator States can not deal justly with non-European subject races as professional politicians whose views find expression in the daily papers. It is the opinion of these journals that unless much more is done for the Colonies than is being done so far, it will be difficult to offer any moral objection to the claims of the Reich to have the pre-War German Colonies returned to it. British observers who have visited Libya, speak in terms of the highest appreciation of the reclamation work already achieved by Italy in that vast desert.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN ON THE POLISH SITUATION.

For several days past there have been persistent forecasts that the British Premier was about to make a pronouncement more uncompromising than any that he or Lord Halifax had so far made, warning Germany that Great Britain will use all her strength and resources to repel aggression on Poland. It is likely that this propaganda was intended as much to stiffen the Prime Minister's backbone as to prevent British public opinion from lapsing into its normal reluctance "to put British force behind the perpetuation of the Polish Corridor" in the words of King-Hall in his history, "Our Own Times." If so Mr. Chamberlain has refused to be hustled. The attempt to hustle him has, indeed, had the result of making him more cautious and careful to leave as many back-doors open as possible in his undertakings to Poland and his intentions against Germany. The speech is so carefully balanced, the pros and cons so meticulously presented, that it is difficult to decide to what side the weight of argument inclined in the mind of the speaker. Mr. Chamberlain can point to passages in his speech for any course that he may decide in future to take, whether he comes to Poland's help or advises Poland, as he did Czechoslovakia, to come to a settlement with Germany on the latter's own terms. To our mind the speech reads as if it was made to a brief by one whose personal convictions lay on the side of the party whom he was prosecuting. Mr. Chamberlain began by admitting—it can not be denied—that the overwhelming majority, 93 per cent, of the population of Danzig was German. In the case of Sudetenland, though the German predominance was less, the British and French Governments pressed President Benes to hand over the country to Herr Hitler. In the confusion which this created, Poland actively participated in the general loot. Czechoslovakia had a democratic Government. Her people were prosperous. She had a well-trained army and her frontier on the German side was strongly fortified. Nowithstanding these favourable factors, the British Government in collusion with the French Government which was bound by treaty to go to the defence of Czechoslovakia, compelled that country to surrender much of this to the Nazi Power. In all these respects, Poland is the antithesis of Czechoslovakia. She is not a democracy but a military dictatorship worse than the Nazi dictatorship. Her people are the poorest in Europe. Anti-Semitism is rampant and her three million Jews live under constant dread of pograms. She can not defend herself for a single month against Germany. British and French help will take time to reach her. The only country which can be of immediate assistance is Russia and it is significant that Russia was not included in the group mentioned by Mr. Chamberlain as ready to defend Poland. The reason given by the Prime Minister for ignoring the principle of self-determination in the case of Danzig, is that the port is the sole outlet for Poland on the Baltic. But surely there is Gdynia which Poland has been fast developing at the expense, as recently complained by Danzigers, of Danzig. In the Peace Treaty itself, provision was separately made for a Polish outlet "by the cession to Poland of a strip of territory roughly 100 miles long from north to south and 50 miles wide stretching from Gydnia to Bromberg." The Brtish Premier completely lost sight of this important fact. It is obvious that it is not Polish independence which the Western democracies are concerned primarily to defend but their own interests. If this can be done by sacrificing Poland, they will naturally prefer to do so.

Dominions and British Foreign Policy :—Speaking at the Canada Club dinner last week, Lord Lothian who is about to assume charge as British Ambassador at Washington, is reported to have said that the Dominions, if they cared to exercise it, could and did carry responsibility for Imperial policy. He cited as an example the non-renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, in deference, he suggested, to Canadian opposition, although Britain and Australia wished to renew it. As a matter of fact, Canada's part in the break-up of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, was a minor one. The principal influence in obliging Britain to relinquish the alliance was the United States which from the first was alarmed by the growth of Japan as an industrial and military Power. Canada is obliged by the conditions of her political and economic existence to follow the foreign policy of her great American neighbour, and she shares with the latter the fear of Japanese immigration. Incidentally, it may be mentioned though, of course, it had no influence in shaping British policy, that the Anglo-Japanese alliance was disliked in India as it was felt that the guarantee of the security of the British connection by a foreign Power was calculated to lower Britain's responsibility, such as it was, to the people of India. Though for the time, Australia's opposition did not count, it has never ceased to weigh with the British Government. It was owing to it that Britain refused to follow the American lead for vigorous action against Japan in connection with the latter's acquisition of Manchuria and that is also probably the reason why Britain is pursuing what appears to be an unduly acquiescent policy with reference to the present happenings in China. From the first, and especially since the Russo-Japanese War, there has been a kindly feeling between Britain and Japan, the former regarding the latter as her counterpart in Asia. This was reciprocated by Japan which liked to think of herself as the Britain of Asia. This accounts for the acute anti-British feeling manifested in Japan during the recent celebrations of the second anniversary of the commencement of the present war. Betrayal by one had come to be regarded as a friend occasions bitterness which is absent from the feelings towards one who was always a stranger or an open enemy. By the way, those who blame Japan for her activities in the Asiatic mainland, may remember that it was President Theodore Roosevelt who instigated her to seek expansion there rather than in the New World. This has also some thing to do with the fact which an American friend notes with regret in a personal letter received by the last mail. He writes: "One of the worst features is the continued sale of munitions and war materials by the United States to Japan, together with the purchase of 90 per cent of Japan's silk. The United States has been Japan's best friend through the two years of war." Even the amendments recommended by President Franklin Roosevelt in the Neutrality Act will leave the position where it was, so far as Japan is concerned.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

TRAVANCORE ADMINISTRATION.

Travancore, the southernmost of the Indian States, is in many ways particularly fortunate. In literacy it leads not only other States but is far in advance of British India. It has allotted a steadily decreasing proportion of its revenues to its ruler—in the last five decades the civil list has come down from 8·76 per cent of the total revenues of the State to 3·68 in 1937-38, the period covered by the latest administration report just issued. Its population is a prosperous one and the land is generally fertile. Like other matriarchal States, the education of women is advanced. From the constitutional point of view Travancore has had the experience of working a legislature since 1888. In 1932 the State set up a bicameral legislature with non-official majorities in both the upper and lower houses. Local self-government has provided a useful ground for civic training for the subjects of the State. Special care has been taken in the administration of Hindu religious endowments and both the Maharaja and the Dewan received congratulations from beyond the State for their boldness in declaring by proclamation the right of Depressed Classes to worship in Hindu temples three years ago. In matters relating to Public Health, Travancore has requisitioned the help of the Rockfeller Foundation in setting up in the State an efficient welfare service. Travancore has much to congratulate itself upon and its administration report has a special value in these days of political turmoil when one is apt to forget that there are some Indian States which maintain a high level of administration.

In view of the widespread reactions of the Temple-Entry Proclamation one naturally expects to find in the administration report some mention of the working of this momentous reform. Unfortunately there is no information in the current year's report to guide the reader as to the success of the measure. There is just a hint in the section devoted to "New Churches and Mosques" which seems to indicate that the provisions of the Hindu Proclamation might with benefit be extended to other places of worship as well. The Report says:

During the year permission was granted for opening 26 churches and five mosques. It may be mentioned that one of these new churches was intended for the use of new converts to Christianity from backward classes who were not admitted freely into a Church that already existed close by.

In the section devoted to the measures for the uplift of the Backward Communities, there is little to show that the Proclamation has been operative in the State.

The most important event in the educational sphere during the year under report was the promulgation of the Travancore University Act in November 1937. The establishment of a university for Travancore had been under consideration since 1919. Travancore University has now been set up with a view to developing technical and technological education, as well as a centre for the promotion of Kerala art and culture. The senior classes in the existing colleges remained affiliated to Madras University during the year. Other notable educational institutions organised were the Oriental Manuscripts Library, and the Department of Fine Arts under Dr. Cousins.

Throughout the State, primary education is free and except for institutions for Muslim girls, co-education is the rule in the primary classes. Till 1930 girls were admitted to educational institutions at half the fees, but the concession was then modified to three-fourths the usual rate in the case of schools and completely abolished in the colleges. In the separate institutions which are provided for girls after the primary stage, there were during the year ending August 1938, 49,114 students (pages 197, 198 and 200),—or 44,290 girls (page 201)! An equal number, 49,177 girls, were reading in the institutions primarily intended for boys. The general adoption of co-education has led to a remarkable advance in women's education. Apart from the primary schools, the figures show that, while the State caters for 60 percent of the students educated in the Indian languages, private institutions take in 75 per cent of the English educated boys and girls. In contrast to this is the Government policy relating to the education of backward communities. Of the total expenditure incurred by the Government in scholarships and fee concessions, Rs. 85,181 was spent in English schools and Rs. 11,112 in Indian language schools. A little over 17 per cent of the total male population and 12·2 per cent of the women are under instruction. An interesting sidelight on education and crime is furnished by the remark under jail administration that all the eight women prisoners were illiterate, ranging from 16 to 60 years of age.

The Excise policy of the Travancore State is the old one of "maximum revenue and minimum consumption." About 10 per cent of the total revenue comes from the tax on liquor and drugs. It is difficult to maintain that the State pursues a consistent policy of reducing consumption when one reads that "the incidence was 1 anna country spirits per head of population was 1 anna 4 pies against 1 anna 4·42 pies in the previous year." There is a bare announcement about the abandonment of local option in respect of arrack shops which was "tried" at Attingal, which will not increase public confidence in the State policy. The adoption of partial Prohibition in Madras province has put the Travancore Government on the defensive. "When it is recognised," says the Report, "that sources of illicit supply are easily accessible in the State and that liquor can be had from almost any palm tree with no more skill than is required to make an incision and with no more apparatus than a knife and a toddy pot, it will be conceded that Government intervention only operates to regulate both the quality and the quantity of the liquor consumed." In foreign liquor, we have an increase, by one retail shop, in the number of licenses issued over the previous year, and an appreciable fall in the number of gallons imported into the State. The arguments advanced against the prohibition of alcoholic drinks have no validity in the matter of opium and ganga. "The opium required for the State," we are informed, "was purchased from the Madras Taluk Office while ganja was purchased from the British Indian Store House at Vettapalam, and both the articles were issued from the Central Stores at Trivandrum." But for the State the people of Travancore would not be able to get any supplies of opium or of ganja. There can be no two opinions on the State trade in these narcotics and an enlightened Government, like that of Travancore, should not hesitate to give it up entirely, except for medical purposes.

In agriculture and industry Travancore has followed a forward policy. Investigations into the control of insect pests, the experiment of an agricultural colony, poultry farming and agriculture, soil analysis and soil survey, and consideration of marketing problems, all these the Agricultural Department carried out. Industrial education and the progress of industries formed as in recent years the special care of the State. An Economic Development Board was constituted for purposes of departmental co-ordination, two-thirds of its personnel being non-officials. Co-operative societies have been losing their attraction for Travancoreans, membership having fallen steadily since 1933. The Report notes, however, that more women are taking to co-operation.

CHINA: THE AWAKENED GIANT.

(By Walter Brooks Foley)

Since April, 1937, before the Japanese war in China started, it has been my privilege to be in direct contact and correspondence with Chinese leaders. The only comparable group faced with extreme difficulties in their national life with which I have been familiar is in India. The indomitable spirit of genuine optimism and assurance of advance so obvious among Chinese, is amazing to those of us who have witnessed it during two terrible years of war.

After many conferences and conversations and considerable correspondence I wish to record my view of awakened China willing to suffer and expectant of victory.

As a background, Japan claims to occupy 11 provinces containing 941 districts. Of these 941 districts it seem to be true that Japanese actually control entirely only 55. In all the other districts the Chinese Central Government still has a greater or lesser measure of control, including the collection of taxes. Of the 55 districts a majority are in North China where Japan had a preponderance of influence before the war began. The Chinese go so far as to say that "Japan has really won no great victory yet. Our cities along the coast and some on the rivers have been captured, but ours is an agricultural country which is not greatly disturbed by the loss of cities."

China is now entering the second stage of military resistance. It is a stage when positional warfare has become less and less important. Mobile guerilla tactics are being used throughout the country. It is true that the Japanese have penetrated far and wide into China and seem to occupy a huge piece of territory. But, the Japanese military occupation is only confined to the main communication lines and some of the main cities. Even these "lines" and "points" under the Japanese have often been raided and harassed by the Chinese guerilla units. The estimate is, as I stated, that of the nine provinces occupied, less than seven per cent of the territory is actually under Japanese military control. China's war of resistance will be only slightly handicapped even if the connection through French Indo-China is entirely blockaded by the Japanese. China still has her backdoors open to Soviet Russia in the Northwest and to Burma in the Southwest. So far as military supplies are concerned, China can manufacture enough rifles and hand-grenades essential in guerilla warfare. Since China is an agricultural country, her economic life has not been greatly disrupted. Furthermore, the vast economic resources of the Southwest and the inexhaustibility of man-power will sustain China's resistance for an indefinite period.

Since the fall of Canton and Hankow there has been a new confidence and a new determination among the Chinese people. If we try to analyze the present mentality of the people, the following convictions seem to be quite universal. The people are convinced that this is going to be a prolonged war of attrition and that there is no room for any talk of peace or compromise. The people believe that if the Government will carry on this war of resistance to the end, the ultimate victory will be on the Chinese side, and the only way to attain this ultimate victory is for the various political parties to unite and for the Government and people to stand together. Such convictions are not based on wishful thinking. Recent statements by General Chiang Kai-Shek, and Mao Tse Tung, analyzing the present war of resistance, are both scientific and thrilling. These leaders are not labouring under any illusion. They believe that there are three stages in this war against Japan. The first is that of "advance and retreat." The Japanese in this first stage seemed to have the upper hand, whereas the task of the Chinese troops is to exhaust the Japanese and to avoid any decisive battle with the enemy. The second stage is that of "see-saw" warfare. Militarily China has entered this second stage. The task of the Chinese is to stem the further advance of the Japanese and to try to hold their positions. Guerilla tactics behind the Japanese lines constitute the main feature of this second stage of warfare. This is also a stage when the Chinese will take their time to reorganize and strengthen their military forces in the rear. The third stage will mark the beginning of a counter offensive on the part of the Chinese, and that will be the stage when the Chinese hope to drive out the enemy from their territory.

We must not forget that China is undertaking a double task of resistance and reconstruction. Last year (1938) the Kuomintang approved of a "Programme of resistance and national reconstruction." These two tasks are interrelated. To resist the Japanese agression effectively, it is essential to establish a strong base, politically and economically. If a strong base is to be built it is necessery to ward off the enemy's aggression. This explains the view of General Chiang Kai-Shek that during the war of resistance military operation is less important than political and economic progress. It also explains the expansive programme of reconstruction in the country. The unprecedented migration of factories, technicians and cultural institutions has rapidly developed the industries, communications, education and finances of China's vast interior. The stimulus of the so-called "down river" people arriving among the local people also works toward China's progress. The elimination of corrupt officials and mental weaklings is very good evidence of advance. The rapid growth of mobile industrial cooperative units gives point to the changing base of the economy of all China.

Political unity has become a fact since the outbreak of hostilities. The "united front" applies both to political parties and to government and people in "occupied" areas and "free" territories. The whole country is now united under one ideal, one government and one leadership. All the political parties, including the Communists, espouse Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Three Principles as the highest ideal of national liberation. The National Government in Chungking now has control not only in areas directly under the Kuomintang influence but also in the Northwest formerly under the Communist domination. The National Government likewise appoints administrative officials in the vast territory behind the Japanese lines and has even appointed officials for the four North-eastern Provinces, known as Manchuria. Most important of all, China is fortunate in the undisputed leadership of General Ching Kai-Shek due to his policy of resistance against Japanese aggression. Strange as it may seem, there has been an increasing measure of democracy even in the midst of war conditions. The organization of the "People's Political Council" is another step toward a democratic government. It is a symbol of the unity of the Chinese people and an expression of the desire of the government to seek the counsel of the leaders of the country in its conduct of military and political affairs. General Chiang has been recently made chairman of this Council. The tendency towards democracy is also seen in the "guerilla areas" in the North, where the local government is practically elected by the people.

The masses are now really awakened to China's crisis. The terrible shake-up of the war and the atrocities committed by the Japanese soldiers in the "occupied" areas have made the masses of the Chinese people fully aware of the utterly destructive consequences of Japanese invasion. The wanton destruction of Chinese cultural institutions and the extensive air raids have made the experiences quite vivid to the rural and city residents alike. At least 50,000,000 people have been forced to flee from their own homes. Among these refugees there is a universal hatred towards the Japanese, but it should be pointed out that the Chinese make a clear distinction between the Japanese militarists and the Japanese people. They realize that Japan is under the rule of militarists, and that the invasion of the Japanese military in China brings hardships on the Japanese people. The Chinese use the slogan of "Down with the Japanese militarists" and not "Down with the Japanese people." They also understand that this war of resistance is a part of the unfinished process of the Chinese revolution which will mean the unity and liberation of the people. Furthermore, the Chinese people also believe that they are fighting not only for China's own liberation but also for the vindication of international justice and the sanctity of international treaties.

Chinese youth are taking a very important part in the present struggle for China's existence. There are many Chinese students who have given up their studies to join the troops or to render their service to the wounded soldiers in the front and to civilian refugees in the rear. Thousands of students have gone to Yenan, the ex-Communist Capital, to enter the "Resist Japan University" or the "North Shen Academy" for training related to the war of resistance. The Kuomintang has also organized the San Min Chu I Youth Corps to enlist youth to render useful service to the country. Other students have organized themselves into small groups to go to the country districts to do propaganda work through the use of mass singing, dramatics and cartoons. But the greatest contribution of the Chinese youth in this war of resistance is what-is-called "political work" of which there are several phases. One phase is to raise the morale of the masses. The second phase is to spread political education among the soldiers. The third phase is to try to convert the Japanese soldiers captured in the fighting lines. The government leaders now realize that "political advance" through political work is even more important than military advance or military operations. Since the outbreak of the present hostilities there has been a mushroom growth of training institutes for political workers. About 100,000 Chinese youths have been enlisted to render this kind of service throughout the country. The attitude towards Christianity has become much more favourable. The government leaders are grateful for what the Christians and missionaries have done in the "occupied" area, especially at the time of Japanese occupation. The lift in the ban on Christian education in primary schools is a concrete expression of their gratitude.

There has been a change of the international situation in favour of China. The most depressing period was after the Munich Agreement. Talk of mediation was very much in the air at the time. Some government leaders were weakening in their determination to carry on a long term resistance. That was culminated by Mr. Wang Ching-wei's leaving Chungking and his declaration in support of Prince Konoye's peace terms. But the international situation is changing. The democratic countries like Britain, France and America, are more firm in their attitude against the Japanese encroachment of third power interests in China, and also more pronounced in their continued support of the Nine Power Treaty. Britain and America granted their credit loans to the Chinese Government in December, 1938. The amount was quite small, but the psychological effect has been tremendous. The policy of America on rearmament and the gradual turning away from the dotrine of isolationism is especially encouraging. It is believed that if China carries on the war of resistance indefinitely, the international situation will become more and more favourable to China's side. China does not expect other powers to fight against Japan, but she hopes and expects to receive more help by way of financial credits and war supplies and to see economic sanctions applied against the aggressor. If international treaties are still to hold an important place in international relationships, China has a right to expect the other Powers to help her in such manner. On the other hand, the Axis powers can lend little or no assistance to Japan.

Japan's talk of the "New Order" in the Far East is simply hypocriticical and not supported by actual facts. Occupied areas are nominally under the various Puppet Regimes, but the real power is in the Japanese hands. The Chinese people therein are subdued by fear and live actually in a "mental prison." There is a strict censorship of the news.

MINORITIES IN THE PUNJAB.

(By H. L. Mehta, Lahore.)

Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan has on more than one occasion boasted both outside and inside the Punjab, that he has meted out to the minorities in his province a very generous treatment and that they are perfectly contented. And the proof of his fairmindedness and their consequent contentment according to him, is the absence of any violent agitation by them as also of communal riots in the province. And further on he traces the communal disorders in the Congress provinces to the "atrocities" committed by the Congress governments on the Muslims. As there is no counter-propaganda on behalf of the Hindus of the Punjab to expose these pretensions, an impression is likely to gain ground not only among non-Hindus but even among Hindus in Congress provinces, that Sir Sikandar must be right. But a close study of the situation will disillusion even those who regard Sir Sikandar as an embodiment of justice. So far as the representation in services is concerned, it is regulated on a religious basis and not on the basis of efficiency. And for that purpose, he has fixed percentages for the various communities—viz.-50% for Muslims, 20% for Sikhs and 30% for others. Thus to the Sikhs whose population is about 11% he has given a weightage of 9% evidently to retain their sympathies. So far as the Hindus are concerned instead of getting any weightage to which they are entitled as a minority, they get about 25% representation in services, which is below that to which they are entitled on a population basis, their population being according to the 1931 census figures about 26·32%, which figure itself is wrong. And in the police, veterinary and co-operative departments even this percentage is not adhered to, in the recruitment of Hindus, whereas the Muslims in Congress provinces are given heavy weightage—viz. 25% to 40% in various services, as against a population of 5% in the C. P., 33% to 60% as against a population of 14% in the U. P., and 25% to 33% as against a population of 7% in Madras, and so on and so forth. Promotions are also affected by communalism. Hindu seniors are being superceded by their Muslim juniors. Hindus with superior qualifications are ignored, while Muslims with inferior qualifications are taken in order to make up the percentages. In the education department, Hindus with superior qualifications are appointed as headmasters of schools, while Muslims with inferior qualifications are appointed as principals of colleges.

The admission to medical, training and other educational institutions is also made on a communal basis, and in this process also, the Hindus are the worst sufferers. Urdu as a medium of instruction for boys up to the secondary stage continues to be forced down the throat of the Hindus on the pretext of its being the would-be lingua franca of India, whereas in Congress provinces education for the Muslims is demanded in Urdu in order to safeguard their cultural interests. Thus the same cultural safeguard is denied to the Hindus here. The Congress Governments have allotted lump sums of money to advance the study of Urdu, while here in the Punjab, no such grant is given to advance the cause of Hindi. In Congress provinces the Governments maintain both for boys and girls Urdu schools, while here in the Punjab, no such schools are maintained for teaching Hindi, and the very few Hindi schools for girls that exist, being maintained by the municipalities, are being closed down under the orders of the Minister for Education, and the protest of the Hindus against the teaching of Urdu to their girls remain unheeded. The only alternative for them is not to send their girls to such institutions, where Urdu is taught. In the U. P. Urdu continues to be the court language along with Hindi, but here in the Punjab, the Indian court language is solely Urdu.

From the economic point of view, the position is this, that, except in the Ambala division, in all the other four division the agriculturists are mainly Muslims. The creditors are all Hindus while the debtors are mostly Muslims. In 1901 the Land Alienation Act was enacted, which stopped the mortgaging of lands of agriculturists to the non-agriculturists. By this measure the gainers were mostly Muslims while the losers were all Hindus. From 1901 onward the land transactions continued between the agriculturists only, viz. between big Muslim landlords and Muslim holders of small holdings in the four divisions, and between rich Hindu agriculturists and the poor Hindu agriculturists in the Ambala division. The Restitution of Mortgaged Lands Bill recently passed by the Punjab Assembly restores lands mortgaged before 1901 through which again the gainers are mostly Muslims and the losers are all Hindus. An interesting but discriminatory feature of the Act is, that it is silent on the point of restoring lands mortgaged after the year 1901 as that mostly affects the Muslim landlords, who constitute a majority in the ministerial party, and who if their pockets are touched (in this case the peoples to be benefitted also would be mostly poor Muslim agriculturists) would run away from the party, thus endangering the ministry. This Act alone has caused to the Hindus a loss somewhere in the vicinity of Rs. 15 crores.

The other economic measures enacted recently in the teeth of terrible opposition have completed the process of the financial ruin of the Hindus. Thus these measures, which outwardly appear to protect the agriculturists from the moneyed classes, were designed to crush the Hindus and have achieved the desired end. Even so able and impartial an economist as Prof. Brij Narain (by the way he is a rationalist and does not feel much sympathy for the Hindus as such) has condemned these measures in unmistakable terms on economic and discriminatory grounds.

In regard to the freedom of the press and platform, recently the violent speeches of the Muslim League deputationists who toured the province, have been appearing in the Muslim papers. But, so far as the Hindu papers are concerned, even a recital of the Hindu grievances is sufficient to demand security from them and the securities are forfeited on trivial excuses. Similarly there is no check on the violent speeches of Muslim speakers.

The Punjab Premier is present at all depressed class meetings, openly encouraging a section among them to ask for separation from the Hindus in all spheres of administration. They are even being asked to demand that they should be separately classified in the coming census. They are already being separately shown in the annual statement. Strenuous attempts are being made to provide separate electorates for them, in the proposed Lahore Corporation, against which proposal, a storm is brewing. It is again an interesting feature, that though the majority among the depressed classes are labourers and petty agriculturists they are not given the benefit of the Land Alienation Act, inspite of their vehement protests. These people have also been agitating against the recent economic measures, which have hit them also very hard. Instances are not lacking, when the Premier has tried to set the depressed classes against the caste 'Hindus' and has thereby alienated the sympathies of even the moderate Hindus. In the words of the depressed class leaders themselves in the Assembly, who were until recently with the Premier, the Government has done nothing as compared with the Congress governments, to improve their lot. In spite of the fact, that the Sikhs occupy a better position (19% representation in the legislature aginst a population of 11%) as compared with the Hindus, they are also up against the ministry. In 1937 there were 31 out of 48 Hindus (7 out of 8 Harijans) and 17 out of 33 Sikhs with the ministry in the assembly; and now 20 out of 49 Hindus (4 out of 8 Harijans) and 14 out of 33 Sikhs are with the ministry. The above figures show beyond doubt, the amount of confidence of the minorities which the Punjab Premier enjoys. The explanation for these defections given by the ministerial party is, that the deserters are the representatives of the moneyed classes who could not reconcile themselves to the "anti-bania laws," passed by the Assembly. But what is their explanation for the Sikhs and Harijan deserters, who are not the representatives of the commercial classes, but represent the agriculturist classes?

He has chosen a novel and unintelligible way of rooting out communalism while he allows the whole administration to be run on communal lines: he does not answer questions relating to communal grievances in the Assembly. The government being predominantly Muslim, the Muslims have no grievances to voice, and thus they do not suffer by this method. Thus this device is intended, on the pretext of ending communalism, to deny to the Hindus, a major outlet to voice their feelings against the government measures.

Such are in brief the utterances and actions of our Premier, who is noted for his sobriety in speech and action in circles outside the Punjab, who have not studied him at close quarters. As regards his contention, that because the minorities are quiet, they are contented, the fact of the matter is that they are not quiet. The economic measures of the ministry have met with violent opposition. There have been held dozens of conferences protesting against these laws. Article after article by one eminent person or the other exposing the pretensions of the Premier regarding his much trumpeted solicitude for the minorities is appearing in the local press. Glaring instances of oppression and injustice in one field or the other are being reported in the press every now and then. Even so moderate and impartial a paper as the Tribune has frequently protested against the communal policy of the Premier. Last year Master Tara Singh, the veteran Sikh leader, levelled against the Premier a number of most serious charges accusing him of conspiring with some of the leading Muslim divines in the province for crushing the minorites. These charges found publication in almost all the papers but remain uncontradicted up to this day. Of course there has been no virulent campaign, urging opposition to the government measures in the press or on the platform; while the former is due to the existence of dicriminatory restrictions on speech and writings as also to their indifference to protect even their just rights the latter is due to the inherently peace-loving mentality of the Hindus.

THE ARYAS IN HYDERABAD.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

You have been pleased to write a scathing note against the Satyagraha movement in the Hyderabad State in your renowned journal of 1st July. As the reflections contained in this note are based either on ignorance or wrong judgment, I am taking the liberty of sending to you what I consider the correct interpretation of the whole affair and trust that you will extend to us the hospitality of your columns as journalistic etiquette requires.

It is now a little over 6 months that the Arya Samaj started Satyagraha in the Hyderabad State for the removal of certain religious restrictions and disabilities. The step was taken neither in haste nor in a spirit of light-heartedness. On the contrary it took the Arya Samaj six long years to try to negotiate with the authorities to come to an amicable settlement. But when all constitutional methods of personal approach, representation and appeal failed, a big Arya Conference was held at Sholapur during last Christmas week. It was here that 11 demands covering our grievances were made. Their perusal will without doubt convince every reasonable and unbiassed mind that they should have been allowed without a moment's hesitation, for the mere asking of them, in these days of enlightenment by a big State like Hyderabad which is applauded, in season and out of season, by its supporters as the best administered and most advanced State in India. Not only this but with a view to make the way for settlement easy these demands were, at a later stage, reduced to only three—i.e. full freedom of worship, freedom of preaching, consistent of course with due regard for the feelings of the followers of other religions, and the erection of new mandirs, the repair of old ones and the hoisting of "Om" flag on mandirs. But the administration has not so far seen its way to concede even these demands. So the struggle continues with ever increasing grim determination. The result is that over 11 thousand Arya satyagrahis from all parts of India have been incarcerated and 12 deaths some under very suspicious and tragic circumstances have already occurred in the State jails.

Though a flood of light has been thrown from Press and platform on what the Arya Samajists are out to seek, yet it is surprising and painful to find the colossal ignorance in this respect, not only of men of light and leading but even of some of the most forem most journals like the Indian Social Reformer. For instance, it has been said in its issue of 1st July that the Madras and Punjab Governments have prohibited agitation in connection with the satyagraha in Hyderabad in their respective provinces under the Princes Protection Act. The Madras Government only banned two meetings one after the other at a particular place in the town of Madras and one at Bezwada under Section 144 as a matter of precaution against attacks and not that there was anything to be apprehended from the Arya Samajists and has, after that, practically removed even this hindrance, and meetings are now being freely held. The Punjab Government, no doubt, in its overzeal to serve a neighbouring state, if a state situated at a distance of more than one thousand miles could be called neighbouring, has applied the Princes Protection Act; but this action of the Punjab Government has been universally condemned as utterly unjustified. Even the Civil and Military Gazette of Lahore, a reactionary Anglo-Indian daily, has condemned the Punjab Government for it, in unequivocal terms. Speaking of the religious demands of the Arya Samaj the paper says:

> The Punjab Government would not contest the right of the Arya Samaj or of any religious body, to make this demand for their rights. It is, in fact, difficult to justify on ethical grounds repressive action against an organisation which is working for this end. Moreover, grave doubt is cast on the neighbourliness [illegible] of the Punjab Government's attitude towards the Muslim League deputation which recently toured the Province with the express purpose of stirring up hatred and contempt of Congress Governments in other provinces. Neighbourliness then had no part in the Punjab Government's policy, why has the virtue suddenly blossomed?

The Punjab Government sought justification for the application of the Princes Protection Act to the Punjab in the disturbance that took place in Rohtak some time ago and recently at Kaithal. In both these places the Aryas, even unconcerned Hindu wayfarers, were set upon without any provocation which is fully demonstrated by the unqualified apologies by the Mahommadans concerned in both these places. So the Princes Protection Act was never applied by the Madras Government while it was absolutely unwarranted in the case of the Punjab.

The Bombay Government never stood in need of any help from the Arya Samajists to maintain peace. If some of the Arya Samajists in a talk with the Minister responsible for Law and Order told him that as far as the Arya Samajists were concerned they were as anxious to maintain peace as the Minister himself was, surely it did not mean that he could not maintain peace without the help of the Arya Samajists or for the matter of that without the help of any outside agency.

The attitude of the Bombay Government has always been to allow liberty of action for the redress of wrongs even against itself, provided the agitators remained within the bounds of law and did not in any way disturb peace. The Congressmen who are now holding the reins of Government, will be false to themselves if they stood in the way of those who were legitimately and peacefully fighting for their rights. It is really amusing for the Social Reformer to ask if the Bombay Government would extend similar hospitality to the Muslims if they led jathas to Sholapur through the Hyderabad State and defied the Bombay Government as the Aryas are defying the Nizam's Government. The reply is simple and straight. In this case the question of hospitality does not arise. The jathas would be, as they should be, straightaway clapped in jail and treated, if it were possible for the Bombay Government to do so, with as much callousness as the Aryas are being treated in the Nizam's jails.

A still more grotesque assertion has been made. And it is this that, if 150 Arya Samajes were allowed to exist and carry on their usual functions, "they could not be suffering from any serious restrictions on its religious propaganda." It is on the face of it a very wrong assumption. The mere existence of 150 Arya Samajes does not prove that there are no religious restrictions or disabilities imposed upon them. The Arya Samajes are not of one day's making, but the restrictions are recent and galling. Those who are members of these Samajes have been groaning under them. Havan Kunds have been prohibited, "Om" flags have been forcibly removed from the Samaj Mandirs, Arya Samajes are asked to get permission from the Ecclesiastic Department, a department controlled by orthodox Muslims, for the erection of new mandirs and the repair of old ones. It is a notorious fact that such permissions are either not accorded or delayed which frustrate the very object for which permission is sought. Arya Samajist preachers, like the renowned Pandit Ramchand of Delhi whose lectures were attended by thousands of Muslims also and were highly appreciated, were ordered to quit the State or criminal cases were instituted against them. Surely this can not be called a happy and equitable state of things under which any church could live happily and thrive. The untold hardships which the Arya Samajists are bearing is an ample proof of the fact that there is something seriously wrong in the state of Hyderabad otherwise no sensible man would willingly offer himself for incarceration which means so much suffering, even death.

Delhi,
July 6, 1939.

RAM PRASAD.

[This letter has but a casual relevancy to the editorial note in the Reformer on which it professes to be a comment. That note was a criticism of the Press Note of the Bombay Government (which was quoted in full) which took official cognisance of the Arya Samaj's activities in connection with the satyagraha in Hyderabad State and removed the ban which it had earlier imposed on the organisation of these activities from its territories on the Aryas undertaking to help assist the Bombay Government to maintain peace in Sholapur. We criticised this action as short-sighted as it was bound to recoil on itself. We expressly stated that we were not discussing the merits of the Arya Samaj satyagraha and mentioned, only incidentally, that a sect which, with scarcely 5000 declared members out of a population of over 12 millions, had 150 centres in the State, can not be subject to serious hardships. (The figure is incorrect though our correspondent accepts it. They have only about 50 mandirs.) As, however, our correspondent has sought to justify the satyagraha, we are obliged to say that satyagraha as it has come to be understood is nothing but organised hooliganism, and is absolutely incompatible with the propagation of religion. We may deal with this point more at length on a subsequent occasion. But here we may note the incongruity of Congress suspending its Satyagraha and a Congress Government ostentatiously affording facilities for the Arya Samaj Satyagraha.—Ed., I. S. R.]

THE JEWS IN THE U.S.A.*

Social scientists recognize that anti-Semitism has been expressed in various ways over long periods. There is the social anti-Semitism that excludes Jews from summer hotels, clubs, etc. There is the anti-Semitism in the universities and colleges of the country, also of long standing. A distinguished committee of Harvard professors, of which Ralph Barton Perry was chairman, in submitting a report on "Some Problems of Personnel in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences" on March 25, 1939, made important findings on "sectional, racial and religious discrimination" in that university. The committee stated that it was difficult to assess the extent of anti-Semitic bias in the making of faculty appointments, but that "those who raised the issue seemed in agreement, to use the words of one of them that 'racial prejudice is so throughly ingrained and taken for granted that no one takes much notice of it except in particularly flagrant cases'." The professors went on to state: "In any case it is the committee's view that the university should regard as a part of its educational function the liberation of its students from racial or religious prejudice.....Conscious or unconscious anti-Semitism would be a betrayal of the best traditions of the university." Educators also sometimes refer to unwritten rules in regard to quotas of Jewish students in well-known colleges and universities of the nation.

There is evidence that anti-Semitism increased in times of economic stress and depression. In times of crisis, insecure people look for scapegoats and simple explanations of their difficulties. For example, in the readjustments immediately after the World War, a noted industrialist encouraged anti-Semitic propaganda. In the early 1920's the Ku Klux Klan was reborn and flourished for a brief period on a program me aimed at Jews, Catholics and Negroes. But during the more prosperous years of 1926-30 these movements seemed to have relatively little significance. During the economic depression much more has been heard about anti-Semitism than during the fortunate years.

There is an important political aspect to current organised anti-Semitism. Many promoters of it were very active in the 1936 presidential campaign. The burden of their propaganda was that "The New Deal is a Jew Deal," and the personnel of the Roosevelt Administration was the object of attack. The overwhelming victory of President Roosevelt in the 1936 compaign almost silenced these professional promoters for a brief period. Now with the 1940 campaign already under way, those who wish to make political capital out of anti-Semitism are again opening up for business and claiming renewed public attention.

What are the facts about Jewish influence on American economic and social life? The most extensive collection of reliable materials on this point was made by the editors of Fortune magazine in 1936.....Nothing like it has been issued since that time and the general situation is believed by competent students to be about what the editors declared it to be then. The material appearing in that report is summarized below.

The survey considered the factual ground for expressed fears of Jewish domination in American life. The Jewish birth rate, like the birth rates of most other groups, has fallen. One report for Jews in New York in 1932 gives their birth rate at 17·5 per 1000 population, as compared with 16·5 for non-Jews, this slight difference being probably explained by the fact that about half the Jews living in the city were still first generation immigrants who have a higher birth-rate than is general in the population. The number of Jews, it is true, has increased in the United States at a very rapid rate if one considers 1800 as compared with 1930. One reason for this rapid increase was the fall in the death rate, chiefly the infant death rate. Since immigration into the United States is now greatly restricted, and since the Jewish birth rate is about the same as that found in most other groups, there would appear to be no ground for anti-Semitic propaganda base dupon any increase in numbers.

The next question, more fundamental, is whether there are facts to support the charge that Jews are monopolizing or are likely to monopolize economic opportunity in the United States. Do Jews dominate industry and banking, as is sometimes alleged?

In this connection an important point, not stressed in the Fortune survey should be noted. The survey refers solely to the participation of Jewish individuals in American busines. What the survey does not make explicit is that Jewish individuals have diverse opinions on many of the great economic and community issues, in the same way as, let us say, American Protestants. Every informed person knows that the American Jewish community, far from being united on most issues is actually divided on them. There are, for example, three branches of the organized Judaism.

There are about 4,500,000 American Jews. The great mass of these people like the great mass of non-Jews, is made up of workers in trade and industry. Nevertheless, it is a common observation that Jews are concentrated in the cities. Nearly half the Jews in the United States are in New York, where about 30 per cent of the population is Jewish. It may be very definitely stated that the Jews do not run banking in the United States.....Of 1,375 members of the New York Stock Exchange, [illegible] 18 per cent are Jewish.....The clothing business [illegible] the spectacularly outstanding exception to [illegible] generalization that Jewish industrial interests [illegible] the minority.

But what about Jewish control of agencies [illegible] opinion such as newspapers magazines, radio, [illegible] motion picture, the theatre?.....There are [illegible] four important Jewish newspaper publishing [illegible] which own chains of papers. In magazine ownership [illegible] they are even less important. Of about 200 [illegible] advertising agencies only six are Jewish.

In the New York theatre about half the producers [illegible] are non-Jewish. Of the two large broadcasting [illegible] chains, one is under control of Jews. Considering [illegible] radio stations outside of New York, the [illegible] majority are non-Jewish. Fortune writes:—

> The movies, however, are the chief point of anti-Semitic reliance and there a persuasive case may be made. The Jews were the first exhibitors of movies because the early movie theatres could be operated on little capital: They were commonly empty stores with folding chairs for seats and a derelict piano. Large returns in such centres tempted them into production. That certain of the Jewish producers were men without influence upon the popular taste was unfortunate, no one, and least of all the cultivated Jew, will deny. Today Jewish control of the great moving picture companies is less than monopolistic. Three of the eight principal companies are owned and controlled by Jews. Two are probably controlled and owned by non-Jews and of three the management and ownership are divided. But though Jews do not monopolise the Industry moneywise they do nevertheless exert great complete control over the production of picture.....Of 85 names engaged in production either as executives in production, producers or associate producers (including independents) 53 are Jews. And the Jewish advantage holds in prestige as well as in numbers.

What about the professions, particularly law and medicine? The anti-Semitics claim that Jews are crowding out the rest of the population in these two professions. Here the situation in New York must be considered separately from the rest of the country. At least one-third of the doctors in New York are Jews and about one-third to one-half of the lawyers. But one third of the population in New York is Jewish. The most important office law business are in the hands of non-Jewish firms. Jewish legal activity is found most commonly in the bankruptcy courts, real estate law, negligence, divorce, collections and litigation in general. In other words, Jews are to be found in those branches of the law that generally do not interest non-Jewish lawyers, or on the branches related to commercial activity such as real estate, textiles, where Jews are very active. Thus the importance of Jews in trial work becomes significant. They are found in the courts trying cases more frequently than non-Jewish lawyers. One reason for this condition is that non-Jewish lawyers prefer the routine of office practice.

In medicine, in spite of the large number of Jewish doctors, hospital medical boards in New York are apt to be controlled by non-Jewish doctors, and Jews and non-Jews are frequently found as colleagues on those boards. Nevertheless, the editors of Fortune report that the feeling between Jews and non-Jews is much stronger in medicine than in the law. This appears to be due to competition between Jews and non-Jews to enter medical schools. It is stated that about 14,000 men and women attempt annually to enter 76 medical schools of the highest standing in the United States. Of those applying about 50 per cent are Jews. Of those admitted about 17 per cent are Jews.

Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

NOTES.

The Indian National Congress :—We welcome the recent decisions of the Congress authorities regarding the singing of Bande Mataram and the hoisting of the Congress flag. They are to the effect that the song is not to be sung nor the flag hoisted even if a single voice is raised in deprecation. The greatest need of the country is reconciliation and harmonising of all interests, sentiments and communities, subject only to the dictates of the moral law. Even to secure this paramount need, nothing that is unjust, unfair and injurious even to the smallest minorities should be countenanced. Subject to this condition, every other consideration must be subordinated to the active promotion of peace, friendly understanding and harmony in Indian life. The National Congress in its inception was actuated by this ideal. It accepted the existing social and political order and sought by well-considered reforms to bring it in harmony with the advancing ideas and aspirations of the time. The non-co-operation movement was a violent and revolutionary departure but, right or wrong, it is too late and altogether purposeless now to speculate whether without it things today would have been very different from what they are. The decisions in regard to the song and the flag, and even Gandhiji's invocation of the aid of the Viceroy in the Rajkot affairs, are steps calculated to bring the Congress back to its orginal moorings, and we are heartily glad of them. The movement in the Congress represented by them does not come a day too soon. Notwithstanding its professed objects, the Gandhian era has not succeeded in bridging the differences between communities and interests. This is the plain fact which he who runs may read. It is bad strategy, to put it at the lowest, for the vanguard to push too far ahead of the main body. The process of consolidation must be completed even if it necessitates a temporary retreat in the advance towards swaraj.

Non-Congressmen and the Forward Bloc :—Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose was almost cold-shouldered by official Congressmen during his recent stay in Bombay. In the Congress Socialist Party his activities have brought about dissension. It is in the relations which he and his colleagues of the Forward Bloc have sought to establish with non-Congressmen that there has been a noteworthy departure from latter-day Congress policies. Mr. Bose himself had interviews with Mr. M. A. Jinnah, the veteran President of the Muslim League, and with Dr. B. R. Ambedkar of the Independant Labour Party, in Bombay. Both these political leaders have been drawing farther away from the Congress since the introduction of provincial autonomy. Equally notable was Mr. M. N. Roy's visit to Poona as the guest of the Servants of India Society. If the Forward Bloc is to have a future in the country, it is a wise step to seek a wider basis than that of the Indian National Congress. We have always felt it a grave defect of that great organisation that it deliberately rejected the co-operation of distinguished leaders by its insistence on political irrelevancies. Mr. Bose would have rendered great service to the Congress had he undertaken his negotiations during his presidentship. Apparently the interests that had grown up round the Congress, prevented his taking the initiative then. It is not too late, however. The formation of a national party with politicians of all shades of opinions working side by side will serve two useful objects: It will bring into national politics several veterans who are now out of it and it will provide much-needed ballast to the Leftist groups.

Satyagraha by Permission :—Among the resolutions passed by the All India Congress Committee last week was one directing that no Congressman should undertake satyagraha (which includes fasting, picketing and otherwise making oneself a nuisance to everybody else) without the permission of the Working Committee. Mr. Subhas Bose's apt comment on this is that it is kicking down the ladder by which Congress rose to power. Nothing can show more clearly that the term has come to have a conventional meaning entirely opposed to its etymological one. Satyagraha means action by a person under the constraining pressure of Truth. It is absurd to ask a man under such a pressure to ask leave of a Committee. We have shown more than once that satyagraha as it has come to be understood, has inhering in it the condition of its own destruction. Right conduct is conduct which can be universally practised without injury to any one. It will be absurd to lay down that a Congressman should not tell the truth without the previous permission of the Working Committee. Yet the resolution on satyagraha is not very different from that. It must be patent to the onlooker that the Congress has passed its idealistic and formative stage and that its activities at present are concerned chiefly with maintaining its position against forces which it itself has let loose and which threaten to overwhelm it.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

"Civil Liberty":—One of the first things Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru did after regaining his freedom, was to establish a Society for the protection of civil rights and liberties. This Society still exists but it has had the unexpected fate of having to record breaches of these rights and liberties by Congress Governments. What is more, the Pandit himself in his capacity of President of the Planning Committee for the industrial development of the country, took exception to the Secretary of the Committee, Mr. Kamath, who resigned from the Indian Civil Service some time back to join the Congress, joining the Forward Bloc of Mr. Subhas Bose. Mr. Kamath pointed out that there was no condition attached to his acceptance of the Secretaryship. "The conditions laid down at present," he added, "are not far different from those I had to labour under while I was in the Indian Civil Service." This home-thrust stung Pandit to the quick. He expressed his astonishment that it should have been made but could not show that it was unjustified. He admitted that no conditions were made when Mr. Kamath accepted the Secretaryship, "but certain things are supposed to be understood." We see Mr. K. T. Shah has been appointed General Secretary. We wonder if these conditions are 'understood' in his case also and whether he agreed to abide by them. Civil liberty evidently means liberty to harass a non-Congress Government for acts which are to be accepted as "understood" when done by Congress leaders themselves.

Socialist Dissensions:—In the course of the correspondence which passed between Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose and Gandhiji after the Tripuri Congress, Mr. Bose hinted at a split in the Congress Socialist Party. The split has occurred but the party continues to function without loss of members though under a changed leadership. Four of the Congress Socialist leaders have resigned from the Party Executive. In a statement to the press, they reveal that their main reason for doing so is their disapproval of the Forward Bloc or the "left consolidation." Such a step, they say, will result in the extinction of the Congress Socialist party and the strengthening of the more well-knit and better financed Communist parties. They also feel it inadvisable to divide the parent organisation, the Indian National Congress, into exclusive blocs. The second objection is a most surprising one coming from Socialists who might surely have thought of the dangers of division when they founded the Congress Socialist group as a within the Congress. As for the threat the Communists, this seems to us a baseless If the Communists seek to form a bloc the Socialists, it can only mean that by selves they are unable to push forward their programme. Since the Communist bel in destroying the present order and the Cong Socialist in building upon it, such an alli between the two should necessarily a victory for the more moderate party. fact that the four dissenting members felt it duty to resign from the executive, seems indicate that the party as a whole does not sh their fears. A fifth leader, Mr. Narendra D has appealed for greater party discipline. W he is less specific than the four who ha resigned, in pointing out the dangers to the par he too regards the menace from the extrem as the most immediate. Like Pandit Jawah Nehru, many Congress Socialists are reluct to take sides in the dispute between Mr. B and the right-wing leaders. We shall not surprised if, like the Pandit, they find themselv drawn on to the side of the Congress right-wing for all practical purposes. The Congres Socialist Party has, by its decision favouring th Forward Bloc, repaid Mr. Bose for extending his patronage and almost identifying himself with it in his presidential address to the Haripur Congress.

Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan at the Rotary Club:—One of the tragedies of contemporary Indian public life is the conversion of the Punjab Premier from an open-minded statesman into one of the principal exponents of the Muslim League. That he is not very comfortable in the communal role is evident from the fact that he readily relapses into his natural role whenever the opportunity offers. Sir Sikandar was on a visit to Bombay in connection with a meeting of the Working Committee of the Muslim League among the resolutions passed by which is one condemning the Congress Provincial Governments and calling upon the Secretary of State to institute an enquiry in their administration by a Royal Commission. Almost directly from Mr. Jinnah's home on Mount Pleasant Road Sir Sikandar made his way to the Taj Mahal Hotel where the Rotary luncheon was served. In his address at the function he cited the success of all the eleven Provincial Governments, Congress and non-Congress, as proof of the capacity of Indians to administer their own affairs. Referring to the rejection of the Federation scheme by the Congress, the Muslim League and the Princes (for totally different reasons) the Punjab Premier outlined an alternative scheme which would reduce the Federal centre to complete impotence. The short experience of Provincial autonomy has shown that the Central Government finds considerable difficulty in controlling the provinces in essential all-India matters. Sir Sikandar's plan will make its position still worse. He is afraid of the Federal Government developing into a unitary Government if its powers are not severely restricted. If the Punjab Premier follows the trend of events in countries where the rights of the component units are being rigorously safeguarded, he will find that their constitutions are strained to breaking-point in order to meet the pressure of the world forces induced largely by the scientific means of communication in modern times. The history of India shows beyond doubt that the country had prosperity within and security from foreign invasion, only when she had a strong central Government and that when it weakened or allowed the provinces to grow stronger than itself, the country was plunged in anarchy. The crowning mistake of the Hoare scheme was the break-up of British India into autonomous provinces. All the powers they now possess and more should have been given to them but by devolution from the Centre. The rejection of the Federation by the Princes—we are afraid it is only a gesture—affords a God-sent opportunity to retrieve this grievous mistake.

Professor Joad on the Bible :—We reprint today a remarkable article headed "The Gospels Re-Read" from the Spectator. It is remarkable because Professor Joad's observations are just those which might occur to a non-Christian student of the Bible. It is quite as remarkable as appearing in the conservative, not to say conventional, Spectator. In the New Statesman it would have excited no surprise. This shows that British intellectuals are able to take a detached view of the Bible. Priestley in his "Midnight in the Desert" and Aldous Huxley in his "Ends and Means" display the same detachment. Aldous Huxley, indeed, shows a competent and sympathetic familiarity with the Bhagavad Gita and Buddhism. The Calcutta University has invited him to deliver a course of lectures on Comparative Religion. They are sure to be illuminating. They will also, like Sir Radhakrishnan's lectures at Oxford, help in establishing intellectual contact between India and Britain, which is of more abiding importance than trade pacts and political conventions.

Ceylon Unemployment Scheme :—According to a press message the Times of Ceylon published the forecast that the Ceylon Government's scheme for repatriating Indians has been modified. Daily-paid non-Ceylonese in Government service who have no homes in India to return to, will be retained in service as special cases. Persons who abuse this proviso by false declarations, will, if discovered, be summarily dismissed and sent away without gratuity. Those Indians who have married Sinhalese women, will also be permitted to remain. A later report states that the Ceylon Government is understood to have given, at the request of the Indians, more time to those who have been asked to leave, in order that they might settle their affairs. If the Ceylon Times' information is correct, Government are to be congratulated on the reasonableness of their attitude. The two concessions go a long way to meet Indian objections and the sting has been to a large extent taken out of the repatriation scheme. No responsible Indian publicist can object to the Ceylon Government pursuing within these limits the policy of helping its nationals to greater economic security. The ready response of the Ceylon Government to Indian representations which were sent in from every quarter with the utmost moderation, furnishes fresh evidence of the ties that bind the two peoples together.

Indians in Burma :—Dr. Ba Maw who is the leader of the Opposition in the Burma Legislative Assembly, told a meeting of the Kerala Association in Rangoon that all the troubles of Indians settled in Burma would vanish if they thought "horizontally instead of vertically." Dr. Maw went on to explain that no such division as Indian and Burma should really count and that there were only two groups, the exploiters and the exploited. It is a familiar feature of Socialist argument that all other differences must evaporate in the face of class wars. Dr. Maw is not in the Government today and we do not know how far other Burmans accept his solution of treating those Indians already in Burma well, if further immigration is controlled. Dr. Maw, however, in advising Indians not to ask for compensation for losses sustained in riots, drew on a wrong analogy, that of Hindu-Muslim riots in India. It is not unknown in India for a penalty to be levied from a community which is held to be the cause of the disturbance and in political agitation it is a common feature. That, however, does not make the method a sound one. Every community in the State should be made to bear the expense of reconstruction as the destruction of property is a loss common to all in a country. Marking out some communities as the beneficiaries of a fine levied on a different group of people, is not calculated to promote the best relations between the two sections.

Politics and Reform :—In his article this week, Mr. Ganguli returns to the charge against the Congress. From his remarks it is obvious that a general distrust of the Congress heirarchy prevails. In a speech to the merchants at Madras, Mr. Rajagopalacharya also referred to public suspicions but, unlike Mr. Ganguli, he felt that if more trust was shown in the good faith of those who held office, the country would gain by the result. Too much is expected of Gandhiji in matters relating to the Congress. It is generally forgotten that the responsibility of everyone of us is necessarily great to maintain the springs of public life unpolluted. This is particularly true of those who hold positions of influence. In the present political conditions prevalent in India, leaders should not rest content in the knowledge that they are above reproach. Every step should be taken to convince the public that those entrusted with the conduct of affairs, are incapable of yielding to the temptations of high office. We are fortunate that in several provinces this is true of the men at the helm.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER
BOMBAY, July 8, 1939.

HALIFAX ALTERNATIVES.

Lord Halifax gave away the whole case for a moral justification of the British overlordship of India, when he commended it to advanced Indian politicians as better than Communist, Fascist and Nazi domination. Lord Halifax is one of the few statesmen of our time holding responsible office, who profess the belief that the universe is governed by moral law and that what has ceased to serve a moral purpose may linger on for a time but is surely on its way to extinction. As we have repeatedly pointed out when Europeans talk of democracy and dictatorship, they are all the time thinking only of white men. British democracy has not the same meaning to Indians as to the Briton and the White inhabitants of the "self-governing" Dominions. British statesmen have been saying that they will oppose any State which aspires to world domination. That they are themselves exercising domination over a large part of the world, does not strike them as discrediting the sincerity of their protestation of abhorrence of domination. Let us take two matters which bring out the character of British domination. It was stated last week that in the scheme of Imperial defence in the Far East formulated by the British Government, India has been allotted a place. Were any steps taken to ascertain whether the Indian people wished to have a part in this scheme and if so what part? Does it not strike Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Halifax that to decide for three hundred and fifty millions of human beings in this arbitrary fashion, is nothing but domination against which they profess to be anxious to protect the world? Take another instance. During the last few days the world Press has published figures of the gold reserves of the principal democratic countries. Every one of them conserves its gold with jealous care and is adding to its gold stocks. In India, on the other hand, every week large shipments of gold are made to foreign countries. This policy is being deliberately maintained in the teeth of public protests. Is this domination or democracy? No doubt India has been given a sort of constitution bearing the outward appearance of the British Parliamentary system. But the only freedom enjoyed by provincial autonomy is to levy more taxes. It was recognised many years ago that the limit of taxation in India had been reached. The bureaucratic system was afraid to levy new taxes for fear of popular discontent. Under autonomy this fear has been removed. And the provincial Governments are obliged to do what their bureaucratic predecessors shrank from doing. This is about all the democracy enjoyed by the provinces under the new constitution. The country is paying a heavy price for an imitation article.

The costliness of British colonial administration and its tendency to impoverish the subject people, is frankly brought out in the Economist's comment on the Colonial Adminstration Report presented to Parliament last month. The Economist, like Lord Halifax, institutes a comparison between British and Nazi Imperialisms but it does not, like him, conclude that all the advantages are with the former and none with the latter. It observes:

> It is impossible at this moment of time to avoid the question of what a newly colonising Germany would do for her overseas possessions; and it is impossible to escape the answer that, whatever essential elements of political freedom, racial toleration and social justice might be lost in a Nazi Empire, at any rate a policy of intensive economic development would be pursued which, while designed to supply raw materials to the Reich, would, incidentally, by making more of the colonies' resources, raise the income of the Colonies themselves.

How much of political freedom, social toleration and social justice, is enjoyed by non-Europeans in several British Colonies, is known to us in India. As a matter of fact, under the German regime the colour bar was less in evidence in East Africa than it is under the British democratic regime. The Economist's observation may be paraphrased in a concrete way. The British Colonial system has for its ultimate and remote aim the conferment of a qualified vote on the colonial native; the German system offers no vote—the German himself has none in his country—but it is likely to bring more bread to the starving people. The Economist proceeds to observe:

> The point is, whether we can make the best of both worlds. On the political side, British administration has hitched its wagon to the star of ultimate self-government, the star which has come into sight in a shower of sparks in the great sub-continent of India. Can that political development be associated at the same time with a parallel policy of economic development which will give to the shadow of political self-rule the substance of economic well-being and welfare?

Political self-rule is verily a shadow without the substance of economic well-being. The vote can not keep a man from starving if he has not food to eat. What India has been given is aptly described as a shower of sparks. What will be the difference to India, we ask Lord Halifax, if she passed from British democracy to the domination of Nazi or Fascist or Japanese dictatorship? She is a nonentity in international affairs now and she will continue to be so then. Though she pays a heavy price for her defence, she has no voice in its organisation and to her sons the army is a trade and ceased long ago to offer a career. Matters will continue to be much the same though on the continental scale the cost may be somewhat less. We have so far left out the third alternative which has not struck Lord Halifax, of leaving India to shift for herself. No doubt Lord Halifax believes that if India is left to manage her own affairs, she will mismanage them. No doubt he fervently believes that he and Mr. Neville Chamberlain are managing the affairs of Great Britain admirably. What Englishmen constantly ignore and what, from their insistence, even Indians have come to

"He adds to a lively, and occasionally malicious, pen a keen sense of humour and a certain confidence in his own judgment, which is the habitual prerogative of youth. The result is an engaging book, which tells us almost as much about Mr. Natarajan as about the places he visited and the persons he encountered."

"May well prove invaluable to other young Indians addicted with Western Wanderlust. For here they will read of the hotels he patronised, the tips he gave the porters he employed, where and what food he found, and the conclusions he sedately drew." The Times of India, Bombay.

"A pleasant souvenir of a six-months holiday which Mr. S. Natarajan spent in Europe last year. Mr. Natarajan left the shores of India on February 12, 1937 and when he set foot in Europe he found the whole Continent in a State of frenzy. The Civil war was in full swing in Spain, nervousness had gripped Naziland, Paris was getting the Exposition ready and England was all agog with excitement in view of the (then impending) Coronation of King George VI. Mr. Natarajan had plenty to see and hear during his sojourn. And he did well in taking his typewriter with him." The Hindu, Madras.

more, is that the chief factor of success of British rule in this country, in so far as it has been a success, has been the capacity of Indians to appreciate modern ideas and to give effect to them, within the limits set for them. This capacity for adaptation has not altogether left us. With the utmost goodwill, Great Britain with her increasing commitments in Europe, must find it impossible to defend India and then, India will have to rely on her own depleted resources and untrained manhood to defend herself. The feeling that British support cannot be counted upon is becoming increasingly clear to thinking Indians. We commend to Lord Halifax this third alternative as likely to prove satisfactory to all parties and to be conducive to world peace.

THE ORIGINS OF FASCISM.

There have been innumerable explanations of how Fascism came into being and it is rarely that the author of any of them has had the necessary detachment to leave aside his own prejudices. Those who have opposed Fascism—and the number has increased since the growth of Nazism in Germany has turned it into a world movement—ascribed its appeal to subtle and unscrupulous propaganda, to persecution, to reactionary forces attempting to put off the collapse of capitalism. Those who have defended it, mainly rested their thesis on the conditions prevailing before the advent of Fascism in their country, or to the revulsion of the people to the iniquities of a previous Bolshevik menace. Dr. Goebbels in one of his latest replies to the charge of persecution, pleads realism as his defence and asks Franco-British-American critics to abandon the moral pose in discussing international politics, no one's hands being clean. All these arguments and counter-arguments seem to rest on the assumption that a pyramid can be stood on its apex; none of them explained how Fascism came to be accepted.

A notable attempt to take the subject out of this vicious circle, was made three years ago by Dr. Schumann in his "Hitler and the Nazi Dictatorship." The author's main explanation was that the Nazi movement saved the lower middle classes, from being reduced to a level with the class immediately below them, the proletariat. This is a thesis worth considering. If the lower middle classes have gained under the Nazi rule economically and politically, then the Nazi movement is in line with political development in Europe. The rise to power of first, the aristocracy, then the middle class under democracy, and now under Fascism the still lower and more numerous classes of artisans, skilled workers and clerks, shows political power descending from class to class. Even if the actual control of power rests unchanged in the hands of the old rulers, the very acceptance of this point of view by the leaders of the movement would mean a revolution which must bear fruit sooner or later. Such an acceptance can only be inferred from the declared ideal of the Fascist-Nazi State to abolish unemployment and the earnestness with which the efforts of Germany and Italy have been directed successfully to that end. For unemployment is the one fear of this class. Herr Hitler, himself one of this group, has written vividly of the supreme problem of its members in Mein Kampf. To this community the problem in post-war Europe was not so much how to improve their children's chances of a better life but rather how to ensure that their lives would not steadily deteriorate. Security became the great need in place of the democratic ideal of economic progress. The prospect of equality makes an appeal stronger than the certainty of a secure position only so long as equality remains or appears to be attainable. The success of the economic ideal in the first century of its struggle for acceptance lies in this very position. Its failure today can be accounted for by the general fear in vast masses of the people of slipping down into worse conditions. For while, as it has been remarked, it is difficult to rise out of one class into another, it is exceedingly easy to slip down from a higher class into the one below. Herr Hitler remarks in Mein Kampf:

> Those among whom I passed my young days belonged to the small bourgeois class. Therefore it was a world which had very little contact with the world of genine manual labourers. For, though at first this may appear astonishing, the ditch which separates this class which is by no means economically well off, from the manual labouring class is often deeper than people think. The reason for this division which we may almost call enmity, lies in the fear that dominates a social group which has only just risen above the level of the manual labourer—a fear lest it may fall back into its old condition or at least be classed with the labourers.

Such an explanation marks Fascism out from reactionary capitalism on the one hand and from Marxist Socialism on the other. Even those who do not accept the thesis feel the need for the distinction.

From another German writer comes yet one more detailed study of the rise of Nazism. Dr. Peter F. Drucker in "The End of Economic Man," has given us a thought-provoking analysis of Hitler's movement. Dr. Drucker, however, regards the movement as a break with European History which he sees as one ceaseless striving after freedom and liberty. He divides European cultural history into four epochs, each succeeding one closely following on the previous epoch. "Every organized society," he writes, "is built upon a concept of the nature of man and of his function and place in society." Europe exalted in turn the Spiritual Man, the Intellectual Man, the Political Man and the Economic Man. The time is ripe for the dethronement of the economic man, but Europe has no ideal to put in his place. The Fascist, totalitarian States have put up the Heroic, or what we would call the Military, man. The democratic powers are divided between those who would maintain the present system modifying, if possible, its worst features, and others who would give up the system for the preservation of their own privileges.

Dr. Drucker traces the breakdown of the economic ideal to the years before the War. The post-war years removed any basis that might have existed for popular faith in the satisfaction of economic needs. The collapse of Russian Communism at the very time the Bolshevists succeeded in establishing their regime in Russia, put the final touch to men's disbelief in the attainment of economic equality through Socialism. A less noted failure of the ideals of economic progress was the rejection of industrialisation by the Balkan States. "Instead of the Balkans becoming 'European'," says Dr. Drucker, "large parts of Europe proper—western Poland, Austria, Hungary, Slovakia—which before the War had fully accepted economic progress and the democratic order as supreme goods in themselves, were "Balkanised' and disintegrated socially." And outside the Balkans was the resistance of agriculture to the industrial revolution. Capitalism and Socialism, says Dr. Drucker, both seek to achieve freedom and equality through economics. Economic progress, the foundation-stone of Capitalism, does not create equality. It brings instead, writes Dr. Drucker, > the new and extremely rigid unequal classes of the petty bourgeoisie in to which it is as difficult to graduate from the proletariat as it is difficult to rise out of them into the class of entrepreneurs. If the classes of modern industrial society are not hereditary by law, they have become so almost in fact.

This conflict of classes almost inevitably gave rise to the classless ideal of Socialism. The Marxian thesis, however, does not take into account the large number of people in industrial enterprises on various economic rungs who have all a vested interest in the undertaking. In practice, with industrialization the number of intermediate layers increases and all of them have something to save out of an unequal society. Dissatisfaction with the results of both systems leads to an abandonment of the basic idea of the supremacy of economic needs and satisfactions.

The actual dethronement of economic man and the first undermining of his supremacy are separated by a period in which thinking men were aware of the need for a new concept, particularly in the Churches. But the failure of the Churches to seize the opportunity has been peculiarly tragic. That failure, Dr. Drucker sets down to the strength of reactionism in the orthodox faiths and to the individual, a-social nature of the religion of the best men. There is no social concept to confront Fascism with and the bulk of Christianity inclines to regard Fascism as an anti-materialist movement. The reason for this seems obvious, the Church receives its sustenance from the society it lives in and therefore naturally shares of its character. Dr. Drucker discards the obvious. He explains it on the other hand as follows:—

> The Christians who recognize and understand the true character of Fascism as the greatest foe of traditional order and as the denial of all we hold valuable and sacred, cannot translate their knowledge into an effective programme. For they themselves are unable to rationalize and banish the demonic forces which have caused facism. The pro-fascists alone, by refusing to see the true character of Fascisism and by insisting on judging it on traditional standards, can alone make sense of it.

In his entire chapter on the Churches Dr. Drucker writes on the assumption that the religious bodies did not at any time accept the concept of Economic Man. This is not strictly true, and realisation of the fact will help us in understanding the present position. The churches' tendency towards Fascism is not less today than the tendency in the past for religious organisations to seek the best of terms from the ruling classes of the world. And it is not from the Churches that one can expect an effective opposition to Fascist ideas, though individuals and bodies might resist Fascist force.

In discussing the forces which delayed the collapse of capitalism, Dr. Drucker gives two factors: The economic imperialism of the Great Powers and the existence of the United States of America. It is because he does not appreciate the importance of the colonial system to capitalism that Dr. Drucker's brilliant analysis* of European conditions falls short. The American example has ceased to have much validity today. But the clamour for colonies still persists. The European tradition of freedom and equality up to the rise of Nazism and Fascism, has substance only if Europe is regarded as the universe. Seen in its proper perspective, the traditional outlook has been quite different. Long before belief in economic man was shattered, ... in freedom and equality had disappeared, if it ... was widespread. Concessions in home countries ... lower strata of society were made from time to ... as territorial additions abroad opened up ... fields of domination. In their own continent free ... and equality were allowed free play as ideas ... there was also growing in intensity and ... conflicting tradition, essential for the growth ... maintenance of the colonial system, that ... domination and privilege. So long as the two ... left to mature in exclusive spheres of influence, ... was no obstacle in the way of Europeans ... the best of both worlds. But the result inevitably ... was concealed conflict between the two traditions. The first victory of the colonial idea was not, as ... often remarked, the use of colonial troops in the ... war, but the employment of colonial methods ... meeting trouble in Ireland. The Sanctity of Europe ... was gone. Nazi Germany in her attitude towards ... European weaker powers, has done no more than apply ... colonial methods to European problems. ... Dr. Drucker approached his subject from this point ... of view, he would not have regarded Fascism as ... something alien to European culture and ... monstrosity. The League of Nations by the very ... fact of its existence was a challenge to the colonial ... idea. It failed because it fell a victim to the ... colonial "tradition." Freedom and equality once ... again had been invoked as a reply to the ... existing trend, and this time it failed. Unless ... we see this clearly we cannot discern where the ... ideological resistance to Fascism is to come from. ... Dr. Drucker is right when he says that it is not ... going back to old systems that Fascism can be ... rendered ineffective. If the politicians realise the ... need for opposing world order to national anarchy ... the way out of the present misery will be easy. ... Otherwise the world will have "to grope its way ... through the darkness of totalitarian fascism." ... Inasmuch as he leaves his readers guessing as to the ... nature of the new order, Dr. Drucker adds to the ... uncertainties of the situation. This is a grave defect ... which mars a painstaking study of political ... conditions.
